TWO NEW NOVELS, AT ALL LIBRARIES.

I

THE BLACKSMITH of VOE. A Novel.

By PAUL CUSHING, Author of "Misogyny and the Maiden," "A Woman with a Secret," &c. 3 vols. post 8vo. 25s. 6d.
"It is a treat to read so good a novel as 'The Blacksmith of Voe,' told with animation and humour." Saturday Review.
"The tale is freshly written, with a keen appreciation of scenery and country life." Times.
"'The Blacksmith of Voe' is picturesque, interesting and effective."—Spectator.
"Full of clever character-drawing and rich in striking incident."—Daily Telegraph.

THE FAT of the LAND. A Novel. By

MARY LESTER (MARIA SOLTERA), Author of "A Lady's Ride across Spanish Honduras." 3 vols. post 8vo. 25s. 6d.
"There is some intellectual pleasure to be gained from the bright, cleverly-written dialogue, and the keen and often powerful delineation of character, and the thread of the story itself furnishes plenty of entertainment...... The tale is full of pictures of real life. The authoress has the gift of infusing vitality into her characters and into their sayings and doings. They live and move, not like the mere marionettes we so often meet with in fiction, but as real men and women."—North British Daily Mail.

THE

By BENJAMIN HALL KENNEDY, D.D.

AUTHOR'S PREFACE.

This little book is published in compliance with a wish expressed to me by a large number of Masters, including many teachers in Preparatory Schools, and in the lower forms of Public Schools.

It is intended to be a simple manual for beginners in Latin, preparatory to the use of the Revised Latin Primer.

In order to facilitate the passage of the learner from one book to the other, and also to make it possible for them to be used side by side if necessary, this Shorter Primer has been made, as far as it goes, in the main identical with the Revised Primer, and arranged on the same plan.

It contains the memorial portion of the Accidence with a few of the most important notes and explanations, and the more elementary parts of the Syntax of the Simple Sentence.

A short outline of the Compound Sentence, which did not form part of my original plan, has been added in accordance with the desire of several experienced teachers. In this part it has been necessary, for the sake of brevity, to make the arrangement and wording somewhat different from that of the Revised Primer.

In this book, as in the Revised Primer, I have endeavoured to simplify the marking of quantity by marking, as a rule, only the long vowels. It must therefore be noted that vowels not marked are generally to be taken as short, short quantity being only marked where it has seemed necessary to guard against mistake.

FAD AND FUNK.

THE advocates of free-trade in disease boasted beforehand that the result of the debate on Mr. McLaren's Resolution was a foregone conclusion. It is probable that few of their opponents were of a different opinion, considering the present tone of the morals of the English Parliament. Of the degradation of that tone during the last few years, few, perhaps no, instances could be produced more decisive than the history of the repeal or suspension of the Contagious Diseases Acts. Science, common sense, and charity very seldom join hands in approving any set of legislative enactments to such a degree as in the case of the enactments which have been now, as it is boasted, "finally overthrown" by a combination of ignorance, folly, and the cruelty that affects to be merciful, humane, and religious. It was inevitable that in such a matter defects of administration should occasionally occur, and that proceedings requiring unremitting care and something of self-sacrifice in their conduct should sometimes go amiss. But the evidence of any serious abuse either at home or abroad was, after all the busy malevolence and all the lavish expenditure of fanatics and fools, almost null; the evidence of good done was considerable, and the argument from all the three sides above mentioned was impregnable. Even so notorious a person as Sir Balthazar Foster was, it seems, compelled to admit the other night (his medical knowledge and conscience being apparently above his political) that "at one time [he "did not say whether the time had ever ceased] the medical "profession was very much in favour [not merely of the "maintenance but] of the extension of these Acts." The religious objection is not only not shared by the best and wisest representatives of any church or sect, but is absolutely confined to a few weak-minded, though well-intentioned, persons, and to a somewhat larger number of pestilent agitators who, on one theory of leprosy, would probably have charged the Prophets, the Apostles, and their Master with "encouraging vice" because they cleansed the lepers. From the side of mere sense and reason, avoiding science on the one hand and religion on the other, the argument for the Acts, especially in India, is stronger still. We send at vast expense thousands of mere boys to a foreign land where they have few occupations and fewer pleasures. We keep them in a state of enforced celibacy. We throw them among a population by which anything like general or vagrant amours would be, and is, looked upon with the intensest disgust and indignation. In many cases we keep them and, for imperious reasons of necessity, must keep them remote from towns, in situations where a sort of artificial village of camp-followers is sure to be formed. And hitherto we have, not perhaps with perfect wisdom in detail (it is only the faddist who is perfectly wise), endeavoured to minimize the evils which, since they are men, and there is folly and disease in the world, must result from this state of things. We have tried to preserve health as much as possible, order as much as possible; and to a considerable extent we have succeeded, and might succeed further. Radicals and faddists may be referred to the very Radical and very faddist town of Leicester as to the principle of forcibly isolating and stamping out contagious diseases.

Some years ago the shriekers and the tubthumpers, by the same means which have now obtained what is called the "final victory," procured, as is known, the suspension and repeal of the Acts at home, with the result that garrison towns, which were being slowly purified, are now once more sinks of loathsome pestilence which spreads from them to every part of the country and every section of the community. [illegible] agitators were wise enough in their generation, and they would have been impossibly foolish in any [illegible] conceivable generation if they had ceased to play the card which had already won the former trick. Argument, they know, there is none to bring forward; and even such declamation as they have to bring is not of the kind which will bear the atmosphere even of the present House of Commons. To represent to thinking men enactments which are a message of health and, if they choose, of reform to thousands of miserable women as an insult and an outrage to the female sex, to saddle the religion of charity and healing with the responsibility of bidding the sinners rot in their sin, to argue gravely that the scanty forces of this country ought to be exposed to losses as immediately weakening as, and often more permanently disastrous than, those of a general engagement, would hardly have much effect even on the not Solomonic wisdom of a British senator. So they began at the other end, worked on a certain portion of the abundant supply of fools in each constituency, constructed in each the "margin" which can, or at least may, turn an election, and trusted in that arm of flesh. The result may be seen in the debate of Tuesday, and a most edifying result it is. Persons like Mr. Stuart, Mr. Wilson, Mr. McLaren, Sir B. Foster require, perhaps, no pressure to put them on the side where they naturally would be found—the side of anything that is false and foolish. Good silly folk like Sir R. Fowler, who talk about "what is "morally wrong not being politically right," and forget to take the slight preliminary trouble of showing where the moral wrong comes in, might be found beside them. But look at other speeches. The vast majority of men of sense salved their consciences by not speaking, and perhaps by the collapse of the counter-amendments. Mr. Cavendish Bentinck, who dared to talk rationally, surrendered his own amendment for Sir Richard Temple's, and was only saved the disgrace of running away because the honourable member whom he had chosen for leader gave him no opportunity of fighting. Sir Richard himself, after saying almost everything (except a few quite unnecessary tributes to the "motives" of mischievous fanatics) that should have led him to fight the thing tooth and nail, "ventured not to move" his amendment. Sir Roper Lethbridge seems to have understudied Sir Richard Temple's part of humble hinter at difficulties, and to have over-studied (if there is such a word) his part of the shocked and virtuous person who "will not countenance "anything that can be regarded as immoral." All which, silence as well as speech, hushed voices as well as withdrawn amendments, means this, and nothing more:—"Of course "we know the Acts are logically, politically, and morally "impregnable. But there is the Reverend Jabez Jumper, "who swears he will denounce us from every barrel-head in "Camberwell or Bungay, if we vote for them. One can't "afford to offend the Reverend Jabez nowadays."

And the Government? Except for its bated breath, which is part of the same ignoble comedy, Sir John Gorst's speech was simply decisive in favour of the Acts in general, putting details aside. He showed that the Opposition was utterly wrong and confused in its facts. He showed that it was asking the House in fact, if not in form, to do what is ultra vires. He frankly acknowledged that he, a member for years for a great garrison-town and a seaport, believed neither in the maladministration of the Acts nor in the existence of any real public feeling against them. He went so far as to say that "the generality of the "public strongly regretted the suspension." He mentioned that one at least of those admirable persons who devote their lives to rescue the fallen, while the Rev. Jabez and Mrs. Jellyby are disseminating filthy pamphlets, laments that suspension as a grave obstacle to rescue work. He protested against the "gross slanders" of the shriekers. In short, he said nearly everything that ought to be said. Yet the practical part of his speech was, in fact, that he and the Government he serves were the very humble servants of the House (that is to say, of the Reverend JABEZ and the fringe of shriekers who can turn an election); that, though it would be a little strong to repeal the Acts over the head of the Indian Government, they should be, were, had been already, suspended; and, in short, that, in order to please, say, at a liberal estimate, a few thousand voters scattered over the country, a good work should be undone, a foul plague let loose, and an act of impolicy, cruelty, and positive political crime which is condemned by all the science, the sense, the charity of the country, committed.

And this is the stuff of which we make members of Parliament, Governments, and Ministers in the happy days when the ultima ratio of politics is the Reverend JABEZ on his barrel-head.

THE COMPENSATION CLAUSES.

THE late meeting, or, as it is called, "demonstration," in Hyde Park was perhaps a little more respectable than some previous assemblages of the same kind. Knots of blue riband are less objectionable than hop-poles, and fanatics are often in a certain sense well meaning. The Temperance Societies probably neither invited nor desired the participation of the disorderly classes in their agitation; but no Hyde Park meeting could illustrate more plainly the unfitness of multitudes to exercise the functions of government or legislation. Even the hop-pole mob, and the rioters who several years earlier broke down the Park railings, though they were both ignorant and violent, supported a simple and intelligible movement. Mr. BEALES's followers clamoured for the institution of household suffrage in boroughs, and Mr. GLADSTONE's adherents four or five years ago made similar demands in the name of the rural labourers. The "demonstration" of last week proposed to dictate to the House of Commons on the clauses of a Bill which require the most careful and dispassionate consideration. The question of compensation to owners and occupiers of public-houses, which may be disestablished without fault of their own, is not to be solved by a series of identical resolutions passed without debate or reflection by disciplined groups of partisans. That the apparently unanimous opinion of the crowd was erroneous and unjust is only a secondary argument against the whole method of proceeding. It is intolerable that the authority of the Legislature should be superseded by a promiscuous audience excited by the declamation of irresponsible agitators. As in the similar case of so-called plebiscites, those who settle the issues to be submitted to a popular vote have the control of the ultimate decision. The speakers at the various platforms took it for granted that the Government Bill would confer a boon on the holders of public-house property, who on their part would gladly be exempt from legislative interference. No explanation of their grounds for claiming compensation would have been tolerated. Usurpers of the powers which ought to belong to Parliament never encourage free discussion. A mob is incapable of understanding that there may be two sides to a question.

In their speeches at the Hyde Park meeting and elsewhere the agitators relied chiefly on the statement that Parliament was about to create a vested interest or estate which would afterwards have a claim for compensation. The assumption that the holders of licences have no legal right to renewal is itself an afterthought. Only a few months ago it was generally believed that the justices had no right to refuse renewal except for definite cause. The SOLICITOR-GENERAL made an elaborate speech in the House of Commons to the same effect, and his conclusions were not generally repudiated by the profession, though the question might still be regarded as open. Within three or four weeks the Irish Court of Common Pleas, consisting of four judges, has, after consideration of the English cases, unanimously affirmed the right of renewal; and thus far no distinction has been suggested between the English and the Irish law on the subject. A divisional Court of two judges has still more recently affirmed the contrary proposition that the justices have a discretion in the matter. According to previous cases, the licensing authorities were bound to act on special grounds, and were prohibited from refusing renewal on any general principle. It was, for instance, expressly laid down that the justices could not withdraw the licenses because they might be of opinion that the remaining supply of public-houses was sufficient or excessive. It may be doubted whether so strange a restraint of judicial discretion can be found in the whole compass of the law, and it seems not impossible that a Court of Appeal may arrive at a different conclusion; but the law is undoubtedly for the time settled by the judgment of a Court of competent jurisdiction. The Irish judgment is not binding on an English Court, but it is entitled to respectful consideration. It is notorious that justices of the peace have believed themselves to be compelled, in the absence of specific misconduct, to renew every licence. If they were in the wrong, they may have been misled by a clause in one of the Licensing Acts, by which applicants for renewal of licences were exempted from the necessity of attending the Brewster Sessions, except when notice of opposition had been given. It seemed incredible that Parliament should have at the same time excused applicants from attendance and exposed them to risk of ruin if their licences were refused during their absence.

For the present purpose it is unnecessary, as it would in any case be useless, to contend that publicans have a legal right to renewal. Until and unless the late judgment is reversed on appeal, it may be literally true that, by granting a right to compensation, Parliament might be said to create a legal estate where it had not before existed. The real objection of the Hyde Park mob and its instructors was entirely independent of the legal position of the proposed victims. The agitators protested against compensation as loudly as at present at a time when they must have believed, in common with the rest of the world, that law in this respect coincided with long-established and universal custom. They then objected to the recognition of a legal right, not as invalid, but because they thought fit to regard interest in the sale of liquors as immoral. Since a court of justice has decided that all parties were mistaken as to the right of renewal, the fanatics and their guides have become the champions of the letter of the law, irrespectively of all equitable conditions. It is true that Sir WILFRID LAWSON and his friends have for many years denounced the existence of a kind of property which offends their sentiments; but Parliament, having repeatedly listened to their arguments, has thought fit to stand by while enormous sums were paid for the goodwill of public-houses and for the right of dealing in alcoholic liquors. The High Court would at any time either have ordered the specific performance of a contract for the purchase or occupation of licensed premises, or would have awarded damages for non-performance of the covenant. The vast amount of capital which is invested in the business has lately been urged as an objection to the licensing clauses of the Local Government Bill. It is true that, on the assumption that all public-houses are to be suppressed, the amount of compensation to be fixed will assume alarming dimensions; but the estimates of the amount which have been formed furnish a convincing proof both of the greatness of the injustice which is threatened and of the legitimate title of the present owners of the property. If it is true that the amount of compensation would reach three or four hundred millions, it is impossible to deny that the whole community must have been a party to the accumulation of so great a sum. That a capital equal to more than half the National Debt has been invested by an oversight would be a paradoxical proposition. The opponents of compensation are apparently indisposed to make any sacrifice for the attainment of their objects. They provide the ethics, the eloquence, and the virtuous complacency. The brewers, the distillers, and the publicans will have to find the money. It might have been thought that moral and religious enthusiasts would be willing to pay something for the opportunity of compelling their neighbours to practise the abstinence which it is their own pleasure to preach. The refusal of compensation is dictated partly by avarice, and to a large extent by a spirit of revenge. If all the rhetorical nonsense which has been talked on the subject were true, the country at large, not the dealers in beer and spirits, is responsible for practices which might have been prohibited by law. The great and infallible people, supposed to be represented in Hyde Park, has frequented and maintained the establishments which are now regarded with sentimental horror. The contributions of the publicans to the rates have not offended the moral olfactories of parochial authorities.

The political importance of the Hyde Park meeting was inconsiderable, except as far as it showed that the agitation against public-houses has numerous supporters. The speakers, including two or three injudicious Conservatives, were of little weight. It was impossible to distinguish the processionists after they entered the Park from the neutral spectators who only came for amusement. The beginning of June is the most beautiful season of the year, and last Saturday was the finest day up to that time of the summer. The trees and the grass and the sunshine were in the highest degree attractive, and the teetotal meeting supplied something to hear and to see. If Mr. GLADSTONE had not already thought it for his interest to change his opinions on the subject of compensation, he would probably have made the concession as a tribute to the number of attendants at the meeting in the Park. Mr. CHAMBERLAIN has acknowledged the justice of compensation, and it was at one time understood that the Liberal-Unionists had agreed to support the licensing clauses, with or without some modification. If a large section of the majority is prepared to vote with the agitators, the Government may perhaps be forced to withdraw the clauses. Mr. RITCHIE is pledged not to pass the clauses, but to make the powers of the County Councils conditional on the grant of compensation. If the Government finds itself in a position to press the clauses, it will not be alarmed by the amount which must be paid. The necessity of paying off all the holders of licences at once is altogether imaginary. The reduction in the number of public-houses, and the consequent obligation to pay for a partial suppression, will be occasional and gradual. There is undoubtedly some connexion, though it has never been satisfactorily explained, between the number of public-houses and the intemperance of the neighbourhood. The justices, if they had been at liberty to consult only the public interest, would sometimes have refused the renewal of licences on the ground that they were not required. The County and District Councils will be able to act with greater freedom, and probably the number of licences will for a time slowly diminish. The agitators have not sufficiently considered the question whether local voters will be generally inclined to deprive themselves of their favourite form of accommodation. It has not been remembered that in the majority of cases a disused public-house will cease to be an inn. The profit which is derived from the sale of liquors is perhaps in the majority of cases the principal inducement to conduct the business of a victualler. It may possibly be found expedient to fix a limit of time beyond which no claim to compensation would accrue. The question could, of course, never arise when new licences were to be granted. The Government must act on its own judgment, for there seems to be no chance of effecting a reasonable compromise.

THE RECEIPT OF FERNSEED.

TO walk invisible is an accomplishment which all have coveted—especially in childhood. The gentleman in Mr. PAYN'S new story, who inherited the receipt of fernseed, did not make the most of it (The Eavesdropper: SMITH & ELDER). His narrative is in some places exciting, and in others diverting; while here and there it may be doubted whether the joke is not too practical or too verbal. A confusion of ideas between "aster" and "asterisk" "do not "over-stimulate," and this joke occurs twice. The scenes between the young literary hero of Mr. PAYN'S tale and the agricultural uncle who was literary, too, in his way, might make the famous cat of Mr. MARK TWAIN explode with laughter. But the things achieved by the hero when once he gets his pot of fernseed (which he treats as if it were a mere pot of marmalade) are not very original nor exciting. He overhears his doctors conversing about his case; he sees his maids and men making love, for none of them, naturally, see him; and he overhears the conversation of his friends at the club. But he never becomes involuntarily visible all of a sudden, which an inexperienced person tampering with fernseed would be nearly sure to do, and he never uses his discovery for the benefit either of himself or his country. The fun to be got out of a sudden appearance at an unexpected place has not escaped Mr. PAYN; for when his invisible hero does but tilt a chair at a club, one of his boon companions (one of the hero's boon companions, that is) nearly faints. But this man had a bottle of champagne before him at luncheon. The nerves of a person who drinks a daily bottle of champagne at luncheon are not of a sort on which even the Psychical Society could stake the credit of a spook. But suppose that the three boon companions had all seen the hero suddenly in their midst, and beheld him vanish, then their security for the apparition would have been valid, unless it was a very fast club indeed. Even in that case, it is improbable that an alcoholic hallucination would have taken the same form to all three at the same moment. The coincidence would have been too strong for the most incredulous to believe in, and, in the way of coincidences, the incredulous can stand a good deal.

It is plain that much use might be made, in fiction as well as in fact, of the secret of walking invisible. This obvious truth did not escape the notice of the very earliest romancers, in an age when the art of fiction had probably not disengaged itself from the mere habit of mendacity. Sir JOCELYN'S wishing-cap was not the only head-covering of story. One is actually surprised that the old cap of darkness (Nebelkappe) has not been borrowed and brushed up by some other writer of tales fantastic. Really the notion is almost too good to throw away in a mere suggestion, and it might be wiser to advertise it in the Athenæum:—

TO NOVELISTS.—The Advertiser has an OLD IDEA—as good as new, or better. An eligible opportunity to Comic Writers is now offered. No "Half Profits" need apply.

The cap or helmet (κυνῆ) of darkness, as everybody who has read his APOLLODORUS knows, was in the possession of the Graiæ, and was extorted from them by PERSEUS. Later it came into the possession of JACK the Giant-killer, and there is no doubt that it still exists somewhere or other. He who wore the cap on his head was invisible, and he became visible when he took it off. Hence the obvious embarrassment of the polite PERSEUS of Mr. BURNE-JONES'S picture in the New Gallery. He meets poor ANDROMEDA entirely unclad and padlocked to a stake. Naturally, he wants to ask what he can do for her. Now, if he keeps the helmet on, his wandering voice, unaccompanied by any bodily appearance, will only frighten her. And, if he takes the helmet off, as he naturally would do in accosting a lady, why then the position becomes most distressing—to ANDROMEDA. However, Mr. BURNE-JONES'S PERSEUS takes the helmet off with a graceful flourish, and the result proves that he was right. For ANDROMEDA is as impassive as GRISELDA GRANTLEY in Mr. TROLLOPE'S novel, and is equally unmoved by the apparition of the hero and by his tussle with the conger-dragon.

BALZAC could have made a good thing out of the cap of darkness—the finding of it and the wearing of it. No French novelist will overlook the advantages which such an accoutrement gives an enterprising admirer of female beauty. An English writer is more restricted; but even he can revel in detecting conspiracies and in attending Cabinet Councils. What a chance the cap would be for an enterprising journalist, and what "disclosures" and "revelations" in public and private life he would be able to publish! Mr. PAYN has chosen to employ his fernseed on a small, jocular scale; but what an opportunity he had if he had taken it more seriously!

CONSTITUTIONALISM IN PRUSSIA.

WHAT it has pleased the newspapers to call the Prussian Ministerial crisis of the past week is a very interesting matter—interesting to gossips and quidnuncs, no doubt, in one way, and to other people in another. As usual, the actual facts are matters rather of inference than of positive knowledge, and, as usual also, the inference can, with the requisite understanding, be drawn pretty close. Beyond it fringes of possible and exciting conjecture may be added to any breadth that the political imagination pleases, but these, as a lamented mentor of the English nation would have said, are "facultative." What is pretty certain is, that a certain difference of opinion—which may have been anything from a perfectly amicable disagreement to a sharp dissension—has existed between the EMPEROR-KING and his Ministers; who are, being interpreted, Prince BISMARCK. It has seemed good to this last corporation—which is so very like a corporation sole—that the period of life of Prussian Parliaments should be extended; but, more timid than our Whig rulers in the last century, they have made the extension, not from three years to seven but only from three years to five. It is asserted by one side, and tacitly admitted by the other, that this measure was not altogether agreeable to the present FREDERICK of Prussia, though he signed it; and that the delay in its promulgation or publication—a formal act without which the mere signing fails to transform the measure into law—was either owing to this dislike itself or to an effect of it in the shape of a royal letter to Herr VON PUTTKAMER—the Minister chiefly concerned with electioneering, and reported to be a very old hand at that game—in which the use of Government influence at elections was either strongly deprecated or in the more peremptory Prussian fashion roundly forbidden. Hence delays, hesitations; hence visits of Prince BISMARCK to his master; hence insinuations that the cruel CHANCELLOR was once more taking advantage of that master's ill health to force his will upon him. And hence, last of all, and most unmistakable of all, a curious constitutional homily on the rights and duties of Ministers and Ministries from the North German Gazette.

There is nothing at all improbable in the report of the difference of opinion itself. The Emperor FREDERICK—or, as we are talking of matters purely Prussian, it would perhaps be well to say King FREDERICK—is a prince for whom, putting his physical sufferings entirely aside, all Europe feels respect. With a determination to do his duty to his people at least equal to that felt by any of his ancestors he is universally understood to unite another determination to exert his kingly rights as little as possible, and to encourage what is called the growth of freedom in every possible way. But it is also generally believed that his ideas of the duty of a constitutional sovereign are based upon, and derived from, a school of political thinking which is not perhaps favoured by the acutest and strongest political heads of this present time. It is the school of latter-day Whig constitutionalism which flourished in England for some time before, and for some time after, the passing of the first Reform Bill, and which, fortunately or unfortunately for Europe, was triumphant exactly at the time that most European countries took to constitutions. According to this school, if you gave a people the British Constitution of 1832, or something as near it as might be, and then religiously left them alone to exercise their rights, all must be well. Even at the time there were murmurs against the doctrine, though with us at least they were looked upon as the murmurs of blasphemers. It was pointed out that the thing itself had never been tried, and that nothing like the thing had ever succeeded, in any country of the world except one. It was further pointed out that it had only succeeded in that country for a very short time. And it was pointed out, last of all, that in this happy land it was during the season of its flourishing surrounded, checked, and conditioned by so many other forces—strong hereditary aristocracy, Established Church, rotten boroughs (some wicked folk said these last were the essence and the salvation of the system), and so forth, that no conceivable inference could be drawn as to its working when these conditions were removed, either in its own country or, much more, elsewhere. But the true constitutionalists of the old doctrinaire kind never could give up their faith in "Liberal principles," and of such, it would appear, the Emperor FREDERICK is a kind of survivor. On the other hand, Prince BISMARCK's sentiments on the subject of constitutions of all kinds are known to approach the almost unimaginable profanity of the late Mr. CARLYLE's, as expressed, according to legend or record, in reference to a certain History of England. The PRINCE labours under the idea—a blasphemous heresy according to some, the mother-idea of all political wisdom and national prosperity according to others—that Government is not made for constitutions, but constitutions for Government; that popular rights, freedom of election, and all the rest of it, are only means to an end, to wit, national welfare; and that if you as governor see the nation you govern faring not to well, but to ill, it is your duty by speed of dog or force of crook to get that sheep out of the wrong road into the right, however loudly it may baa that it is only exercising constitutional rights. Between two persons thus minded—the one the strongest person in the kingdom by position and prerogative, the other the strongest by ability and deserts—there is certainly likely to be at least amicable dissension now and then.

We need not trouble ourselves much about the interesting discussion in the pages of our German contemporary on Ministerial responsibility—a discussion, however, which may be commended to Mr. GLADSTONE on one side and Lord RANDOLPH CHURCHILL and Lord CHARLES BERESFORD on the other. The interest in these matters is, as we have endeavoured to show before, something different from a mere constitutional one. It is the uncomfortable doctrine of some persons that constitutionalism of the type we have been noticing has a distinctly weakening effect on national prestige and power. It would be a pity if this doctrine were illustrated and confirmed afresh in respect to Prussia and Germany. For eighteen years that country (for it is simpler to speak of it as one) has been practically free from any difficulties of the kind. There have been Opposition parties, no doubt, and crises of more or less gravity over May Laws and what not. But the Sovereign and the Minister have always been at one, and the chief of all their points of agreement has been an agreement that, while the acknowledged particular rights of the people were to be guarded with strict and scrupulous care, those particular rights by no means included a general right of unlimited self-government, or a privilege in virtue of which the shepherd and the dogs can do nothing but obediently follow wherever the sheep choose to go. On at least two occasions, if not on three, during the present brief reign the sheep have beheld the shepherd and the dogs debating this very point, and at variance with each other upon it. For the moment the dispute appears to have been compromised by the publication of the law without the letter, but with an understanding that a Royal rescript to the same effect is to follow later. Whatever may be the final result of the debate, either in this instance or in others, one result we fear can hardly fail to follow on the repetition of disagreements of the kind—and that is, the increased concentration of Prussian, that is to say German, political attention upon the idle disputes of domestic and theoretical politics, instead of upon the great practical matter of the national power and prosperity. Such a result would be bad for Germany, but it would be worse for Europe. For there would then remain only one Power of the first rank which was in a condition and temper to mind its own business for its own advantage, and the businesses of other people, not for their advantage at all, and it is scarcely necessary to say that this Power would be Russia. Therefore, it is very devoutly to be hoped that the KING and the PRINCE will be able to come to some understanding which may obviate even the rumour of dissension between them; for in such cases the rumour of dissension is very nearly as bad as the dissension itself.

A PLATONIC FRAGMENT.

(Picked up near Hyde Park Corner on Saturday last.)

WHAT, I asked, is the meaning of this immense procession of people? For they seem to me to be going to the sacrifices.

On the contrary, replied HYDROPOTES, we are going to protest against them as altogether excessive. No such fine, we think, should be exacted from the State as the price of enforcing temperance.

With that he was about to follow the procession which was already entering the Park, when I laid hold of his coat-tail and detained him.

Do not stop me, SOCRATES, he exclaimed; for I have a speech to deliver at Platform No. 8.

Not so fast, my good sir, I said. You have first a speech to deliver here—or, at any rate, an explanation to give. For, tell me, what sort of a virtue is this enforced temperance, and what is the fine you speak of as the price of enforcing it?

I have no time now, he replied, to explain it to you. But there sits some one who is of all men the fittest to instruct you in the matter: I mean GRANNOMANTUS, the oldest and greatest of the Sophists.

I looked in the direction in which he pointed, and there truly I saw the man of whom he spoke. He was seated on an obol-chair at the foot of the Statue of ACHILLES, not the one which PHIDIAS modelled, but the work of some less famous sculptor, whose name I do not remember; and there were other chairs round him, for he had been giving a sort of audience that afternoon, as his practice is, to his disciples. He welcomed me very warmly, and inquired what I wanted of him.

Come, then, GRANNOMANTUS, said I, since HYDROPOTES has bequeathed to you the duty of explaining his strange language—what, pray, is the meaning of enforcing temperance, and of the price which is to be paid for it by the State?

Say, rather, which is not to be paid for it, SOCRATES, he replied; for we are resolved to get it for nothing.

I am still in the dark, I said. I entreat you, O best of men, to be more explicit.

We intend, he continued, to close as many of the taverns of the wine-sellers as we can, in order to prevent the citizens from intoxicating themselves, and a decree has been proposed in the Ecclesia for buying up their interests. This, however, we will have none of; and we insist that they shall be compelled to give up their rights of wine-selling, and forfeit the money they have expended in purchasing them from one another.

But is this, I said, your idea of justice?

To this he returned no answer.

It seems to me, I continued, that your conception of the virtue has now fallen below even the imperfect definition of SIMONIDES. For he defined justice to consist at least in speaking the truth and paying your debts, and you would have the State do neither.

Still he remained silent and appeared wrapped in meditation.

You may remember, I said, that it was from this point that we started our inquiry at the house of CEPHALUS into the nature of justice.

Yes, he replied with a smile; but, as you too may remember, it was also at this point that CEPHALUS found he had the sacrifices to attend to, and took leave of the argument.

That is very true; but POLEMARCHUS and others remained.

Undoubtedly they did, said he, still smiling; but with what result? I delight in your conversation, SOCRATES; no one more. But I cannot undertake to let myself in for the whole ten books of the Republic.

Nor do I desire it, GRANNOMANTUS, I answered. I will make no attempt on this occasion to penetrate into the essential nature of justice.

I applaud your forbearance, he said. It will be better, I agree with you, to confine the inquiry within narrower limits.

We will do so. I will ask you, then, whether your definition of justice, be it what it may, should be consistently or inconsistently applied?

Consistently, of course.

And your measure of justice, whatever its length, should be a rigid measure, should it not?

Undoubtedly.

Or should it be a Lesbian rule, which can be bent in any direction that we may prefer?

I have admitted that it should be rigid.

So that if justice consists in discharging our debts, we ought to satisfy all claims upon us alike; whereas, if it consists in not paying our creditors, we shall not be acting justly unless we bilk them impartially all round?

That would seem to be so.

In which, then, of these two forms of conduct, do you yourself hold justice to consist?

The question is an idle one. In paying our debts of course.

Oho! we have got thus far at any rate. I am beholden to you for that admission.

I wish you joy of it, SOCRATES.

Now tell me, GRANNOMANTUS, do you consider that if the State permits the citizen to acquire property under the protection of the law, it should, if it deprives him of that property, indemnify him?

I do, as a general principle.

And the right to carry on a lawful trade is in the nature of property, is it not?

No doubt.

And should be paid for if it is taken away, should it not?

Yes; provided that the trade is moral as well as lawful.

What? Does the State, then, ever sanction immoral trades?

It may have done so; and the eyes of the ruler may be afterwards opened to the immorality of what he has permitted.

I see. Then in that case no indemnity would be due?

No, not in that case.

Nor, I suppose, in the case in which the State has never sanctioned the acquisition of the property?

Yes, we must exclude that case also.

As, for instance, if an officer in the army has paid a larger sum of money for his commission than is prescribed by military rules. You would say, I imagine, that the State had not sanctioned the acquisition of that property, or not at the sum paid for it? Would you not?

That admission, he said very reluctantly, appears to be unavoidable.

And that if the State dispossessed him of it, he ought not to be compensated at its full value. Would you not say that?

Yes, if I were in Opposition, he replied.

What, again, I asked, is your opinion of property in slaves?

I have known many excellent persons who possessed such property, replied he.

But do you consider it more immoral to own slaves than to sell intoxicating liquors, or less so—I mean according to the notions of the day?

It looks as if it would be more immoral—does it not, SOCRATES?

It does, By the Plane tree, I replied, for a specimen of the platanus was growing near where we sat. I suppose, then, GRANNOMANTUS, that, on your own principles, and indeed by the stronger reason, you only partially indemnified your military officers, and gave your dispossessed slaveholders no indemnity at all?

Nonsense, SOCRATES, he cried, impatiently; you suppose nothing of the kind. You know as well as I do that both the military officer and the slaveholders were indemnified in full. And what is more, you are perfectly acquainted with that rule of justice of which you pretend to be in search. You are well aware that it is simply the will of the majority, and that that will is ascertained by assuming it to be in favour of our policy whenever we are in office, and hostile to that of our adversaries whenever we are in Opposition.

I was desirous of pressing him further on this point, but he (for it is an art in which he possesses wonderful skill) evaded the argument.

Excuse me, he said, I must break off our conversation here. I see HYDROPOTES returning at the head of a procession, and I wish to ask him what has passed at the meeting.

THE PRESIDENTIAL ELECTION.

THE periodical excitement of the Presidential election seems of late years to have in some degree abated. The Democratic Convention which has been sitting at St. Louis during the present week has only attracted a moderate share of public attention. It is true that the circumstances explain in some degree the general indifference. A large majority of Democratic delegates, including the seventy-two representatives of the State of New York, brought with them instructions to nominate Mr. CLEVELAND, and he was accordingly chosen by acclamation. Little is known of the candidate for the office of Vice-President, though the sinecure office which he seeks has on several occasions been exchanged for the Presidency. The managers of parties naturally assume that their candidate will live to discharge the duties of his office. The selection of Mr. CLEVELAND by his party is a remarkable event. The Republicans have more than once been equally unanimous in their choice; but Mr. LINCOLN's appointment for a second term and General GRANT's first election were the work rather of the nation than of the predominant party. Mr. CLEVELAND has no pretension to the merit of similar services in the Cabinet or in the field; nor is he either a popular orator or a conspicuous party leader. Four years ago he was elected by a coalition of Democrats with a section of the Republicans on the ground of his high character and of the justice and purity with which he had conducted the administration of New York as Governor of that State. During his Presidency he has maintained his reputation for political honesty, and he has consistently maintained and extended the principles of Civil Service Reform. His career may not have excited public enthusiasm, but it is approved by those who are most competent to judge of his conduct. The Democrats, who have given him their undivided support, must have been the principal losers by his discouragement of political interference with the distribution of patronage. After twenty years of exclusion from power, they not unnaturally hoped to share in the spoils of victory, and under Mr. CLEVELAND's Presidency their hopes have been only partially gratified. Their choice on the present occasion is probably due to their belief that their nomination will be acceptable to moderate Republicans and to neutral politicians.

The Republican Convention at Chicago will be expected with a stronger feeling of curiosity. Up to the date of the latest accounts no candidate for nomination has been definitely preferred to his competitor. More active efforts would have been made by their respective partisans if the managers had not generally anticipated the candidature of Mr. BLAINE. His friends, and even his family, took it for granted that his refusal of the nomination was either insincere or not final. In all probability he wished to keep the question open till he had ascertained his prospects of success. It was known that his health, to which he had attributed his retirement, had been completely re-established, if, indeed, it was at any time affected. His friends confidently asserted that his resolution would be overcome; and they justly thought that in ability and in general popularity he would have an advantage over his rivals. On the other hand, although Mr. BLAINE was a favourite of many Republican politicians, his nomination would have been distasteful to a considerable section of the party. Mr. BLAINE has been always regarded as a typical practitioner of arts which no longer command approval or respect. The election of the Democratic candidate in 1884 has always been understood as a protest against the methods and traditions which are exemplified in Mr. BLAINE. It may be plausibly conjectured that the same feeling still exists, and that the chief Republican orator and wire-puller would repel as much support as he would earn. Accordingly, with laudable fidelity to his party, and probably at the cost of severe disappointment to himself, Mr. BLAINE has formally assured his friends that he was in earnest when he rejected the nomination in February, and that his intentions have not since undergone any change. The Republican State Conventions have consequently, for the most part, appointed "delegates at large," or representatives who are at liberty to exercise their own judgment in the selection of the party candidate. There will be no difficulty in finding a presentable nominee. None of the probable competitors are disqualified, as has happened at some former Conventions, by invidious pre-eminence or notoriety. Among the names which are commonly mentioned are those of Mr. SHERMAN and Mr. CHAUNCY DEPEW, but at present the course is open to all comers. Mr. BLAINE will probably have much to say in the secret councils which control the Convention. Notwithstanding his refusal of a claim to the Presidency, he has not intimated any purpose of retiring from public life, and it is not improbable that he may expect the post of Secretary of State if a Republican Cabinet is formed. According to some reports he favours the nomination of Mr. DEPEW; but in all probability he is not definitely pledged to the cause of any candidate. It is satisfactory to be assured that the approaching contest will be confined to the two great parties. The Labour faction has apparently abandoned its intention of contesting the election, and it would have found itself almost as powerless as the Woman's Suffrage Association.

In framing a platform or declaration of principles the position of the two parties in respect of the nomination is oddly reversed. The Democratic party, having only one nominee, has no need to waste its energies on the comparison of personal claims. The Republicans will have a similar advantage at Chicago in the definite and intelligible nature of their policy. The Democrats have not been able to agree on any fiscal scheme, and the Republicans will pledge themselves as one man against sound economic doctrines. Mr. CLEVELAND's leaning to some system of trade which would be more or less free was plainly intimated in his Message to Congress; but, being evidently hampered by considerations of prudence, he added a reservation of the supposed duty of protecting American industries. He probably understands that his Message was inconsistent, inasmuch as a reform of the tariff would necessarily impair the monopoly of American producers. The majority of Democrats incline to a comparatively liberal policy; but they are afraid of injuring their party, which is already divided on the question. The Republican minority in the House of Representatives has lately obstructed Mr. MILLS's Bill for the reform of the tariff, and Mr. RANDALL has put himself at the head of a considerable body of protectionist Democrats. Mr. CLEVELAND apparently cares rather for relieving the Treasury of its superfluous accumulation of money than for the benefit of consumers of foreign produce; but he has not concealed his opinion that a system of taxes which exceeds the amount of expenditure by twenty millions sterling is both oppressive and absurd. He will be under a disadvantage in the contest with adversaries who propose a simple and definite doctrine. Mr. BLAINE lately delivered an eloquent speech in which he idealized Protection much as Mr. COBDEN or Mr. BRIGHT may forty years ago have described the abolition of the Corn-laws. With the adroitness of a practised orator, Mr. BLAINE assumed the character of a martyr suffering for the avowal of an unpopular truth. He moved the hearts of his audience by pathetic protests against any possible negligence of the supposed interests of the working-man. The profits which are incidentally acquired by protected capitalists are always left in obscurity by the disinterested champions of the labourer and the artisan. The contributions of manufacturers to the funds which are raised for purposes of elections are, it would seem, charitable contributions to the necessities of the oppressed workman. On the whole, the Republicans are more in harmony than the Democrats with popular prejudice. Hereafter they are more likely to lose than to gain by the discussion of economic questions. Even in the political controversies of democratic communities it is a disadvantage to be wholly in the wrong. The cause of free commercial intercourse has made a certain advance since the great parties are more and more divided on the issue of Protection. No other part of the platform either at St. Louis or at Chicago will create so strong an interest.

The Chicago platform will almost certainly contain denunciations of the Fisheries Convention and of the supposed concessions which were attributed to the American Commissioners. The authors of the St. Louis confession of faith could scarcely condemn an arrangement which has the unqualified approval of their chosen nominee. A hundred years of vituperation have hardened peaceable Englishmen against the censures of American orators. The Chicago platform will be studied, not for its facts or arguments, but on account of the temper which it may display. It is believed that Mr. BLAINE has courted the Irish vote for his party not without success. In the United States, and especially in New York, the Irish have hitherto allied themselves with the Democratic party. If they transferred their votes to the Republicans, they would expect consideration for their support in the form of unfriendly relations between England and the United States. It is impossible to avoid occasions of collision. At this time American cruisers are seizing English fishing vessels in Behring's Sea. The Senate is still engaged in the examination of the Fisheries Treaty; and probably it may be convenient that the decision should be postponed till the Presidential election has been finished. Of the present disposition of the Senate some notion may be formed from the fact that it has circulated five thousand copies of the adverse Report of the Foreign Affairs Committee. Some of the speeches which have been delivered are as extravagantly abusive as if they had been made at an Irish Land League meeting; yet every Senator is conscious that the English Plenipotentiaries were in the highest degree considerate and courteous, and that the Canadians have agreed to surrender undoubted legal rights. The SECRETARY of STATE and his colleagues on the Commission have repeatedly testified to the good faith and good will of Mr. CHAMBERLAIN and his associates; but it is impossible to conciliate adversaries who have an interest in cultivating animosity. After the election the Irish vote will not be urgently required by either party. It may then be possible to obtain the ratification of the Canadian Treaty.

THE LAW OF LIBEL.

IF the House of Commons never spent its time worse than it did last Wednesday afternoon this country would have hardly any history. When the Libel Law Amendment Bill has assumed—if it ever assumes—its final form we may have occasion to estimate the changes in the law which it will introduce. At present it suffices to say that, so far as the discussion of the Bill in Committee has gone, it has been, and promises to be, pruned of its dangerous extravagances in a reasonably satisfactory manner. The great question of reports of public meetings has been settled by the retention of the existing enactment that, in order to enjoy the advantages of "privilege," the defamatory matter reported in the course of business must be such that its publication is for the public benefit. This salutary amendment was accepted by Sir ALGERNON BORTHWICK at the instance of the ATTORNEY-GENERAL, who made it a condition of his support, and that of the Ministerialists generally, of the clause repealing the corresponding section in the Act of 1881. With this, and the other provisoes introduced into Clause 4, the law will be put on a not less satisfactory footing than that established by the former Act. It will afford a protection against the danger that the characters of individuals might be defamed by the irresponsible reporting of slanders uttered by irresponsible persons at insignificant public gatherings, and it removes the gravest of the objections enumerated here last week to the Bill as it then stood.

The question of reporting legal proceedings has also been properly dealt with. The effect of the original proposal would have been to make it lawful to print and sell in pamphlet form the most indecent or the most blasphemous evidence given in any trial, contemporary or historical. The effect of the clause as amended will be to give privilege to fair and accurate reports of the evidence given at trials, published at the usual time, and not containing blasphemous, indecent, or scandalous matter. This is in effect an enactment in express and reasonably clear words of the substance of the existing law, and, subject to the possibility of unsuspected flaws being discovered in it by experience—in which case it can be amended—it is quite unobjectionable. The astounding proposal that in one particular class of actions impecunious plaintiffs shall not be allowed to sue without a preliminary test trial in chambers has not yet been reached, but practically it has gone where very bad clauses go. It is much to be hoped that it will be accompanied to that or some limbo nearly as remote by the fifth clause, which proposes to entitle the proprietor of a newspaper who has published a libel without malice and made an apology for it to recover a verdict without having paid money into Court. On this point the law ought to remain as it is. In such a case there must be some compensation due, for subsequent apology can only diminish, and cannot altogether wipe out, the wrong admittedly done. The merit of the present law is that, if the sum paid into Court is not what the jury think enough, the plaintiff can go on and get more, and, if they think it enough, the plaintiff has only his own avarice to blame for not having taken the money out of Court and taxed his costs. The only remaining point in the Bill which may give rise to some difference of opinion is the proposed enactment that no one shall be criminally responsible for a libel unless he was "party or privy to the "publication of the libel." Suppose a person keeps a newspaper of which violent attacks on the moral characters of private persons are a distinguishing feature, and employs subordinates to supply him with as much and as correct information as possible of that exciting kind; suppose that on one occasion such a defamatory story is published—its truth or otherwise makes no difference in a criminal prosecution—without the principal's knowledge, at a time when he has gone for his holiday. Is the editor or proprietor to escape the consequences because he happened to be out of town when the libel was published, or because he reasonably left the conduct of his paper to some one else? Surely he is just as reasonably held accountable for the consequences of the institution he conducts as the owner of a ship is held responsible, and criminally responsible, for allowing it to go to sea in an unseaworthy condition, whether he knew, or had the means of knowing, anything about its unseaworthiness or not.

The tone of Wednesday's debate was, on the whole, eminently satisfactory. The Attorney-General, Mr. Kelly, and other lawyers who discussed the provisions of the Bill showed that, if they had been somewhat tardy in turning their attention to the Bill, and had wanted considerable reminding to make them do so, they at least understood the subject, and were capable of keeping the public interest in view as the main thing. Of the members more or less intimately connected with journalism, Mr. Bradlaugh combined a creditable breadth of view with some knowledge of the subject; and, if Mr. Jennings found it impossible to consider the project from any point of view but that of a potential defendant in a libel action, Sir Algernon Borthwick proved by his candid acceptance of necessary amendments the sincerity of his protests that he at least nourished no dark designs against the reputation of individuals. No one ever suspected Sir Algernon of being anything but an honourable gentleman; but if he had not taken advice, and had succeeded in passing intact the Bill which bore his name, he would have conferred an inestimable service on some people who are nothing of the sort.

THE TWENTIETH FALL OF GENERAL BOULANGER.

MINISTERS come and go in France, but one thing turns up with unfailing regularity under all of them. It is the obliteration of General Boulanger. As Commander in Tunis, as Minister of War, as General at Clermont-Ferrand, as independent politician, it has been his uniform fate to be destroyed once and for all. Whatever happened to him the comment was always the same. Now he is done for, now he will drop into his native obscurity, now we shall hear no more about him, was ever the substance of what French newspapers and English correspondents had to say, with very few exceptions. It was, therefore, quite a matter of course that the result of his motion in favour of revision should have ruined him in the opinion of sagacious observers for the twentieth time. The General appeared and read his paper, while the Chamber howled and gesticulated. From the dignified elevation of the Presidential Chair the virtuous M. Méline japed at him; M. Jolibois struck attitudes; M. Félix Pyat foamed at the mouth; M. Paul de Cassagnac bellowed. Other deputies imitated these great exemplars. Meanwhile the General went steadily on with his reading, answered not a word, wiped his handsome moustache at intervals, and did nothing to disturb the set of a well-cut frockcoat. When he was finished the diversions of the bear-garden went on for a time, and then a crushing majority disposed of his motion, and there was the General dead and buried at last.

There are three chief reasons given with the utmost solemnity and emphasis on both sides of the Channel for believing that the General ought to be and is dead. Firstly, because by reading a paper he showed he was no orator; secondly, because the paper was rather contradictory and tolerably full of platitudes; thirdly, because he had but a meagre programme. We really, after careful consideration, fail to find these reasons conclusive. As to the first, it is to be observed that the General did not become popular because he was an orator, but because his supporters were sick of orators, and wished to see quite another sort of person at the head of affairs. His deficiency in one kind of the gift of the gab (only one kind, for he can be fluent enough on occasions) may hurt him in the Chamber; but his friends want to be rid of the Chamber, and his failure in it will hurt him little in their estimation. As to the platitudes and contradictions of his address, they are patent. But where are we to look for wisdom and coherence in French politics? If anybody will produce an equal amount of printed matter more full of empty phrases and more destitute of meaning than the speeches of MM. Floquet and Clémenceau we will give him his wine. Yet they are thought serious politicians by people who sneer at the General. As for the meagreness of his programme, that also is tolerably manifest. But who has got a better - indeed, who has an alternative? The vote against the General was purely personal. It was against him, not against the revision. The majority of the Chamber has already decided to recast the Constitution. M. Floquet agrees with the General in disliking the Senate and despising the Presidency. When the question comes to be put before the country, it will be a personal matter there also. The policies being essentially the same, the choice will be between some M. Floquet, if not this one, and the General. There is nothing to show that the country will prefer the civilian to the ex-soldier. For the rest the General's address was not so destitute of solid political sense as the great chorus of wiseacres is pleased to suppose. There is distinct substance in his contention that, if France is to have a President, he must be one on the American model. He must be independent of the fluctuations of the Chamber, and capable of exercising some moderating and controlling influence. It was undoubtedly meant that he should; but the removal of M. Grévy has shown that a President elected by the Chamber is a mere figure-head. Unless the President is to continue to be a mere King Log, which the holder of the office has never been in America, he must have some source of authority independent of the Chamber. In this contention General Boulanger will have the support of many who like him no better than do the Parliamentarians of the Chamber. The Royalists and Bonapartists, who have their own axes to grind, are with him for the time, as well as the large party which has been called, with some wit and great sense, "autre-chosiste," the people who simply want a new thing, and believe that the best autre chose for the time being is General Boulanger. What will come out of the fermentation no sane man will undertake to prophesy. It is, however, very clear that the alternative for France is either the temporary supremacy of some one man—the General or another—or a continued welter of irreconcilable factions. He may end by becoming one faction leader among others very possibly. If so, France is sentenced to a still longer spell of division, weakness, and the neglect of all administration. The mind of man can, by refusing to look at the evidence, just conceive the possibility of the formation of a moderate party capable of governing France wisely. If such a time happens, however, it will be a greater miracle than if General BOULANGER were suddenly to become modest, simple, a profound thinker, and a great statesman, and were to retain his popularity in spite of his metamorphosis.

THE CRITIC ABROAD.

MR. ROBERT LOUIS STEVENSON, in the pages of Scribner, has been searching for the gentleman in fiction, and made other discoveries—as sometimes happens to the zealous—than the object of his quest. Very much in the manner of a certain Justice of the Peace known to readers of SHAKSPEARE, he has delivered judgment on the works of HENRY FIELDING. There is something of the manifesto about Mr. STEVENSON'S paper, and not a little that is suspiciously like a journalistic interview. It suggests a curious relationship to the "boom" now in progress—to judge from the American press—which is to set the great American people to the right Stevensonian tune. But it is fishing with "melancholy bait" to denounce Tom Jones as "dirty, dull, "and false," and if intended for the edification of the American public it is likewise exquisitely superfluous. They do not read FIELDING in America, and they do read Mr. ROE. Here Mr. STEVENSON'S characteristic ingenuity appears to have deserted him. The amusing assumption of the judge, the air of the superior person, as who should say, "I am "Sir Oracle," may mitigate the rawness of judgment, but the critical method is somewhat trite and discredited. The thing is only too easy. Thus does the enfant terrible flutter the domestic circle that has forgotten his existence by some sudden aspersion of the family hero. Thus does the bright young man of promise and paradox crush some suburban society of letters and science with the proposition that SCOTT is tedious and NEWTON an impostor. It was only the other day that Mr. STEVENSON very solemnly recorded his opinion that NAPOLEON, BYRON, and the author of Adam Blair were cads. It was expected, perhaps, that a breathless world would be shaken to its centre by this enormous utterance. And that the humour of it should not be swallowed up in the enormity, there appeared in the Athenæum a serious and gentlemanlike protest from a too sensitive friend of the late Mr. LOCKHART. Possibly this small encouragement may incite Mr. STEVENSON to fresh ventures. Curious is it, indeed, that anybody should think it necessary to testify to the good manners and breeding of that admirable writer, JOHN GIBSON LOCKHART, or that persons of intelligence and taste should be in the least perturbed by Mr. STEVENSON'S vagaries.

Not in this direction will Mr. STEVENSON on "Some "Gentlemen in Fiction" be found interesting. The attraction for us lies in the source of these odd, perverse antipathies. How do they arise? that is the problem. Perhaps they come of unkind laudation, too lavishly bestowed on Mr. STEVENSON'S own writings, good, bad, and indifferent. If you class a writer—yet young, and in the first flush of successful production—with a genius like SCOTT, what is more natural than that he should give himself airs, assume the god, and turn a critical eye on his new equals? He begins to doubt—not his position, but theirs. THACKERAY commended FIELDING for his Tom Jones in that he had dared to paint a Man. Mr. STEVENSON looks obliquely at the portrait and declares it is not that of a gentleman, though he admits LOVELACE—"in spite of his abominable misbehaviour"—to his company of select gentlemen in fiction. There is no reason why this opinion should not be held by any gentleman. It is innocent enough, and unlikely, one might think, to commit one to any kind of frenzy. But Mr. STEVENSON is not content to miss the gentleman in Tom Jones. He must profess nicer and newer views of FIELDING than SCOTT did, or BYRON, or THACKERAY. For them FIELDING was, before all, the author of Tom Jones. Mr. STEVENSON regards only the author of "the engaging, truthful, kind, "and clean" Amelia. It was that "dirty, dull, and false" Tom Jones which those three misguided and darkened souls declared to be the masterpiece of its author—Tom Jones, a book which Mr. STEVENSON says is found by the "respect-"able" to be even more blackguardly than dull, while the "more honest" find it too dull to make its blackguardism acceptable. Well, it is an excellent thing to be on the side of the respectable, but if it leads Mr. STEVENSON into this common way of scolding—"dirty—dull—and false"—his friends may well wish him back in his native land. For most of us there remains the philosophy of Mr. TOOTS. "Thank'ee! It's of no consequence."

IRELAND.

WE welcome, as a piece of good fortune which does not every day befall us, the opportunity of expressing our sympathy with sentiments expressed by a leading member of the Parnellite party. The speech delivered by the Lord Mayor of DUBLIN at the opening of the Irish Exhibition did credit to his personal taste and good feeling, as well as to the dignity of his office. No mere formal observance of the understanding that political differences were to be put on one side for the purposes of the occasion would have sufficed to animate Mr. SEXTON'S speech of Monday last with the spirit that pervaded it. It is no difficult matter for any speaker, and still less for one of Mr. SEXTON'S oratorical skill, to smuggle the contraband article of partizanship into his utterances without any open or assignable breach of the prohibitory rule; and there are plenty of ways, too, of showing, even while the rule is respected, that the respect paid to it is reluctant. The Lord Mayor of DUBLIN yielded it a manifestly willing obedience, and showed himself unmistakably pleased with the opportunity of addressing an English assembly in words which every Englishman, without distinction of party, could applaud. His cordial tribute to the services rendered by Lord ARTHUR HILL, as a member of the Executive Council, struck an excellent keynote at the commencement of his speech, and gave it a tone which it preserved to the end. It is not, of course, to be supposed that its amiable generalities would be provided by Mr. SEXTON with quite the same set of particular illustrations with which we should ourselves be disposed to furnish them, if either he or we were called upon to perform that delicate task at the present moment; but, fortunately, there is no such call just now upon either of us. We have our own opinion as to the particular nature of what he calls "the prejudices which are at the root of the "misunderstanding between the peoples of Great Britain "and Ireland." But we can cordially agree with him that, in so far as they exist—on either side—they are not "rooted "in malice," and that they can be "removed by earnest "effort." We shall also thoroughly share his satisfaction if one result of the Exhibition should be to enable Englishmen and Irishmen to "know each other better"; though, of course, we shall retain our own opinion as to which of the two races it is that most requires instructing in the other's character. For though there may be a grain or two of truth in the hackneyed assertion that the English do not understand the Irish, we must venture, on the other hand, to remark that the whole course of our political history for generations past has been a uniformly working agency for the stereotyping of a totally false estimate of the English character in the Irish mind. It would be hardly too much to say that the general election of 1886 gave Ireland her first opportunity of discovering that the Englishman and the English party politician are not exactly convertible terms.

It is not the most pleasant of duties to turn from Mr. SEXTON at Olympia to Mr. O'BRIEN at Cork Park; but, as Mr. O'BRIEN regards himself, and is declared by our own Gladstonians to be, a representative Irishman, it is reasonable to infer that the English will not be able to "know the "Irish people better" if they leave him out of view. Mr. O'BRIEN, it will be seen, is still so exercised about a matter which, according to his own account, is not of the smallest importance that he can talk of nothing else. We know that the effect produced upon cerebral tissue by a very minute particle of foreign matter is most serious, and that may perhaps account for the extremely disturbing results which have been produced upon the agitator by having "Papal Rescript on the brain." Not content, moreover, with incessantly recurring to one matter which he had much better let alone, he abounds in references to another and later incident which it is even more to his interest to pass by. If anything had been needed to show how completely the Rescript had achieved its object, the desired demonstration would have been supplied by the recent meeting of the Irish Bishops and the resolutions adopted thereat. Mr. O'BRIEN, however, is no more able to leave these matters alone than he is able to keep clear of the Rescript itself. "We all know, he said, that the Irish Bishops "could not say in print everything that was welling up in "their Irish hearts"; but they said not one word that could grieve the conscience of any man who endorsed the Mansion House resolution of the Irish members! We do not pretend to say what amount of episcopal censure is necessary in order to grieve one of the consciences referred to; but we do know that enough welled out of the Irish hearts of the Bishops to cause an ordinary English conscience, burdened with approval of the Plan of Campaign and boycotting, to feel singularly uncomfortable. For the first thing that welled out, as aforesaid, was the declaration that the recent decree of the Holy Office was "intended to affect "the domain of the morals alone, and in no way to interfere "with politics, as such, in this country." And the last outpouring from those same wells was a reminder to the "leaders of the national movement" that the Roman Pontiff has "an inalienable and divine right to speak with "authority on all questions appertaining to faith and "morals." Two more inconvenient propositions for Mr. O'Brien and his friends to meet, or a smaller mercy to be thankful for than their promulgation, it would be difficult to imagine. For the former cuts away the pretence that the Pope has been interfering in Irish politics, and the latter drives home the conclusion that his interference may not be resisted without breach of religious duty by any good Catholic, whether clerical or lay. The Irish Bishops admit, in other words, that Leo XIII. has contrived to condemn the Plan of Campaign and boycotting without exceeding his spiritual functions, and they add that when acting within the limits of those functions he must be obeyed. Mr. O'Brien urges the prosecution of the Plan of Campaign and the maintenance of the boycotting tyranny, and at the same time throws up his hat over the declaration of the Bishops, and rejoices to be able to speak of its authors in "terms of gratitude and affection as warm as ever "moved an Irish heart." Surely even the Irish head, though it is apt to overlook a certain kind of intellectual inconsistency, must perceive a little lack of reference here between the premisses and the conclusion?

A like inability to discuss the subjects which are best let alone is, however, displayed on this side of the Channel. The true friends of Sir William Harcourt, by which we mean those who laugh when he is serious and look grave when he jests—would certainly have told him that Mr. Jesse Collings and the complimentary dinner to be given to Mr. Collings were subjects on which it was not advisable to touch, at any rate in the jocular manner. For, after all, no one believes that a muster of all the character and ability of the Liberal party to pay a mark of respect to a man whom the Rump of that party has made the object of what Lord Hartington truly calls "a very low form of party "spite"—no one, we say, believes that this spectacle is really amusing to Sir William Harcourt. Is it, then, wise to laugh at all when you so plainly show that the laugh is "on the wrong side of the mouth"? We do not suppose that Sir William Harcourt in his secret heart regards the action of the Allotments Association any otherwise than it is regarded by Lord Hartington. With all his turn for rough jesting at men more scrupulous than himself—a trick, indeed, which has become more and more necessary to him in his attempts to outface the humiliation of the Parnellite alliance—he has always, to do him justice, perceived the wisdom of keeping the political conflict with the Liberal Unionists as good-humoured as may be; and he has probably a sincere contempt for the silly rancour which was displayed by Mr. Collings's former allies in agrarian legislation when they expelled him from the presidency of a society for which he had certainly done more than any other member of its body. Of course Sir William Harcourt, though he may despise these spiteful zealots, cannot well condemn them openly, and is bound, if he comments upon their proceedings at all, to find in them some material for ponderous pleasantries at Mr. Collings's expense. But then, why should he comment on them at all? To catch a few cheers and laughs from a Yorkshire audience is surely no sufficient compensation for giving additional prominence to the fact, already conspicuous enough to the rural voter all over the country, that their professed Gladstonian friends are not half so anxious to help them as to revenge themselves on their own personal, and we might almost say private, political enemies. As to the other sallies of Sir William Harcourt's speech, they were most of them, no doubt, less indiscreet. His taunting Lord Hartington, for instance, with "broken pledges and violated professions "of faith," is, though an old and perhaps not too seemly a joke, yet undoubtedly a very droll one. The point, of course, consists in Sir William's complete yet quite unashamed consciousness that the last man who should be charged with political treachery is being accused of it by the very last man who should prefer that charge against the worst of political traitors. Lord Hartington dealt quite seriously with the accusation the other night, and explained, not for the first time, what he actually said as to the extension of local government in Ireland. It is quite right, that he should vindicate his consistency in a speech intended not for his accuser but for the public; but that he should be able to reply with gravity to a charge of political apostasy proceeding from this particular accuser reflects the greatest credit on his command of countenance.

EXPERTS AND TALK AND INVASION.

It is agreed that we ought to listen to our naval and military experts. Everybody says so; and Mr. Arnold-Forster has proclaimed it to the City and the world—to the Lord Mayor and the Saturday Review—in a high sniffing fashion. We are heartily glad to get something settled; but, unhappily, this kind of agreement does not carry us much further on, for the question remains—which experts we are to believe. Is it the experts who swore by the muzzle loader till all the world had adopted the breech-loader (whereby our ordnance was put in a position of inferiority), and who have since been cursing the Departments for not listening to expert opinion? Is it the experts who hold that there is no salvation without armoured ends, or those who believe them to be works of supererogation? Is it the expert who wants 185 cruisers, all of over sixteen knots speed; or the other who will be content with 25, and a few more battle-ships? Is it the expert who insists on the necessity of fortifying our ports, in order to leave the ships free; or the other who thinks that, if an enemy can reach our ports, he can sweep up the shipping outside them, and who consistently enough thinks that every penny spent on batteries on shore is wasted till the fleet is strong enough to keep the foe in armour clad at a respectful distance. The loss of the shipping would be disaster enough, and are we to accept it as possible? asks this expert, very sensibly; and he answers, No; let us have navy enough to keep the enemy off, and so supersede the batteries on land. Then is an expert never to be cross-examined? When one declares that the command of the Channel by an enemy would stop our food supply, is no man to point out that there is a road to Liverpool and Glasgow round the North of Ireland? When another shows how impossible it is for thirty-three English battle-ships to watch twenty-nine French, because the Toulon fleet could come into the ocean and join the enemy at Brest and Cherbourg against our Channel forces, is no dog of a non-expert to ope his mouth and ask what the Mediterranean Squadron would be after in the meantime? It can hardly be taken for granted that it should be left to cruise in an empty sea or play lawn-tennis and dance with the girls at Valetta. Experts have made every blunder that can be made. They had the managing of the French army before 1870, and of the Prussian before the Olmütz days, and no civilian could have managed worse. We must choose our expert; and who is to select? Is it to be a gentleman who thinks that England had no enemy at sea between 1805 and 1815 except a few American frigates? That was slap-dash writing, indeed, Mr. Arnold-Forster—it went slap-dash into nonsense. It is really not enough for a gentleman to be full of good intentions—a little young in their ways, and decidedly flustered, but still virtuous—he must also know what he is talking about before he can speak with authority. Not he, but another, must be the chooser of experts.

Then there is another point on which we are all agreed—in much the same fashion. It is on the necessity for increasing the strength of the navy; but, as before, the agreement ends here. There is no general opinion as to what increase is needed, or how quickly it ought to be made. Admiral Hornby wants one number of ships. Lord Charles Beresford wants another—that is to say, he wants them whenever he is not declaring that the desire of his heart is to avoid hasty spending and hasty building, and to get a definite scheme drawn up. He is not only divided against the other experts, but against himself. Lord George Hamilton implies, though he does not expressly say, that we are adding to our fleet quickly enough. He is absolutely right in insisting that time is needed for the work. Lord Charles Beresford—even he could not get his battle-ships built under two years and his cruisers under one. The question is whether we are going on quickly enough, and that more or less depends on the other question what the navy is to do. Here the general confusion is worse confounded; for not only is there the common doubt as to the expertness of the experts, but nobody knows who is an expert. There are the naval gentlemen who do not much believe in invasion, or who, like Admiral Colomb, effusively thank Lord George Hamilton for "upsetting at once and "for ever the ridiculous 'sudden invasion' scare." There are the Directors of Transports, who inform the First Lord that 480,000 tons of shipping would be required to carry a hundred thousand invaders. Are those gentlemen experts? Their business has been about ships from their boyhood upwards, and they have a claim to be heard. But then come the military gentlemen, who, it turns out, are not of those naval experts' way of thinking. They talk about Julius Cæsar and William the Conqueror (who lived so long ago), and the great Napoleon, who did not invade us after all. Lord Wolseley (see how these experts love one another!) says that the Director of Transports has "misled him [poor Lord George!] in a most "discreditable manner." If they had read The Soldier's Pocket-Book—a good thing, gentlemen, and mine own—they would have known that you can carry 100,000 men in 150,000 tons of shipping, though the necessary horses for such an army, a trifle of 30,000 or so, are not included. The exception seems to us considerable, and suggests inquiry whether there are not others. So we are not greatly moved when Lord Wolseley goes on to talk of three-quarters of a ton, and of Russians who pack as tight as herrings in the Caspian—where there are no hostile cruisers. Who is the expert here—the naval man and transport officer, or the Adjutant-General? Neither do the other examples selected by the military gentlemen seem quite conclusive. We shall not stop to discuss the operations of Hengist and Horsa. It is better to keep to times which have been recorded by writers more nearly contemporary than the Venerable Bede. The shocking examples most in favour are Abercrombie's invasion of Egypt and the expedition to the Crimea. Let us throw in the French expedition to Algeria out of the excess of our generosity, and it can be shown that not one of the three is the least to the point. When Abercrombie went sailing half round Europe for months, the seas had been cleared by the First of June, St. Vincent, and the Nile. In the Mediterranean there was not a single French flag flying on any line-of-battle-ship out of Valetta or Toulon. He was able to spend weeks on the coast of Asia Minor in absolute safety, and discover Marmorice Bay at his leisure. When he landed it was against the Brown Bess, and his battle was won by sheer push of pike. If he and Menou had changed places, the invaders would have been bayonetted into the water as completely as they were tumbled out of their field works. The expeditions to Algeria and the Crimea had also no enemy at sea to fear, and their landing was not opposed. Before any invasion of this country is possible, the British navy must be completely destroyed—not merely defeated—in one battle, and when that has happened, we shall be already ruined. There is a difference, too, between those old expeditions and any possible future one which military experts persistently refuse to recognize. It is that they were conducted in sailing fleets, when all fighting operations at sea were very slow and at the mercy of the wind. There was always a certainty then that a covering fleet, unless hopelessly inferior in skill, could get between any enemy and the convoy. If a liner had got among transport-ships—that is to say, not open boats, such as Napoleon was going to use—her way would have been stopped at once, and the damage she could have done would have been comparatively limited. Now ships are propelled by steam an attack can be made with equal rapidity from any point of the compass, and if the poorest ironclad afloat—the Spanish Numancia, the French Reine Blanche, or the English Penelope—got into the convoy with only a steam crew on board, any one of them could go through half the transports in forty minutes or less. An invader would be demented to run such a risk.

We agree, and we imagine that everybody else will agree, with one-half of Lord Charles Beresford in asking time before any further measures, whether of building or re-organization, are taken, a definite settlement should be attained to touching the work the navy and army have to do and the force required to do it. The measure was urged on the Ministry long before it was recommended in speeches on National Defence at the Cannon Street Station Hotel. That Ministers have neglected it is little to their credit, and the only excuse for their neglect we can imagine is the hopelessness of trying to get unity out of the opinions of experts. The excuse is not really valid, but it has a sort of specious force lent it by the wrangling and contradictions of the professional gentlemen. Happily this excuse for dawdling and confusion is capable of removal, and that by the unassisted efforts of the experts themselves. We will show them how. Let these gentlemen adopt the excellent old English custom of doing for yourself what the Government will not do for you. Let them collect at the United Service Institute, or by arrangement with the Committee in a spare room at the Union Jack or the Sash and Marlinspike (military clubs), and there let them work out their idea of a scheme of National Defence. They seem to have ample leisure. Then they can modestly present it to the First Lord and Secretary of State for War. It might also be published, at a moderate price, by subscription. (The Saturday Review will take five copies, as a matter of patriotism.) In this way the naval and military experts may do the State more service than by fluent and contradictory jaw at public meetings. There may be persons who think that such a meeting would end in a battle of the Kilkenny—no, let us be serious, in the confusion of the camp of Agramant. If so, of course there is an end of the authority of experts. If not—then why don't they do it, instead of orating at large?

CRICKET.

THERE is some danger that the Australians, after being overrated, may come to be untimely and undeservedly despised. Their early victories were exactly the victories which we wanted them to win that interest might be put into the game. They certainly were not disgraced in the defeat by Lancashire, a very close affair on a difficult wicket. The match with the Gentlemen merely proved that their bowling could be mastered at Lord's; it by no means proved that they are not quite the peers of the Gentlemen. The Players beat them well; but then they lacked their captain, and perhaps their best bat, Mr. McDonnell. His hand has been hurt by a ball, and it should be remembered that we had the same kind of undesirable "rub in the green," as golfers say, when Mr. Spofforth's hand was damaged by a hard return, from Lord Harris we think. These things are the chances of the game, but it is impossible to replace a Spofforth or McDonnell—impossible, that is, for a wandering Eleven many thousands of miles from its base. At Nottingham Mr. McDonnell was still unable to play, and Mr. Jones has been suffering from a chill, and no wonder, considering the weather. Monday, for example, was a lovely warm day at Lord's; but, about six o'clock, a sudden cold wind blew across the ground, and Tuesday was as cold as midwinter. There was a suspicion of ice in the slight showers, and only the excitement of a very close match kept a few hundred enthusiasts looking on.

The Notts match, however, says a great deal for the bowling of Notts. Barnes is, perhaps, the most consistently difficult bowler in England, now that Peate has ceased to play, and Attewell is an excellent ally. To get even a maimed eleven of Australia out for 76 is a considerable feat. In the Notts score of 215 Mr. Dixon did more than amateurs are wont to accomplish for the great Midland county. His 83 and 26 not out (when 38 had to be got to win the match) were capital performances against such capital bowling. Perhaps we may now see Mr. Dixon playing for the Gentlemen, who will need all their strength when they encounter the Players. Mr. Hedley has also been coming out as a bowler, and it seems possible that a little new bowling may be found by the amateurs, especially if Mr. Collins and Mr. Napier can play. Mr. Daft, Flowers, and Attewell were the other chief scorers for Notts; Scotton, Gunn, and Barnes were disappointing, and it looks as if Barnes were not a Celebrity at Home—to slow bowling, such as that of Mr. Trott, Mr. Jarvis, Mr. Blackham, and Mr. Turner all played well in the second Australian innings, and we fancy that, if Mr. Jones had been there, with his [illegible], and Mr. McDonnell to [illegible] and direct the team, Notts might have had little to crow over.

That Yorkshire should beat Sussex is not amazing. The chief thing to notice is the fertility of Yorkshire in bowling. As if PEEL, PRESTON, and ULYETT were not enough, they have discovered new talent in CREIGHTON and WAINWRIGHT. The Middlesex and Lancashire match became really exciting on the second day. Middlesex went in to get 222, and that against the bowling of BRIGGS, WATSON, and BARLOW. They would have won easily if Mr. BUCKLAND had made the catches which he did not make at slip on the previous day. He appeared to let Mr. ECCLES off twice, when Mr. WEBBE went on to bowl, and Mr. ECCLES consequently got 97; the Fates did not suffer him to reach the century. The task of Middlesex was hard, it was an uphill game to play, and seemed hopeless when Mr. WEBBE, Mr. BUCKLAND, and Mr. SCOTT were all out for 20. But Mr. J. G. WALKER and Mr. HADOW played beautiful cricket—indeed nobody cuts harder and more elegantly than Mr. WALKER. Mr. VERNON and Mr. PARAVICINI also hit hard, but Mr. ROBERTSON'S was the great innings. He had bowled pluckily and with very poor luck, he now batted with spirit and gallantry. Probably he might have won the match, but when he had made 42, the strong east wind smothered a hit that should have gone beyond the ropes; it died away like a swipe at golf caught in the wind, and was secured by SUGG. BURTON now felt the responsibility of upholding Middlesex too heavy for him; DUNKLEY (who had bowled well) made no sign, and Lancashire won by 24.

The match between Oxford and M.C.C. is, perhaps, the most promising thing that the University has been engaged in. Though Mr. GRACE got 95 and 29, Oxford was 48 runs to the good in the first innings, yet probably M.C.C. would have won if time and weather had allowed the affair to be played out. Perhaps Mr. CROOME will prove the long-sought-for bowler; but the worst of Oxford bowlers is their want of consistency. You cannot depend on them, though they may show brilliantly now and then. Mr. CROOME also batted well, and Mr. THESIGER is a great addition to the strength of the Eleven. Mr. WRIGHT, as is his invariable practice, enjoyed the Oxford bowling. His average against the University must be goodly. It is too early to guess how Mr. WOOD will get on with the Australian batsmen at Cambridge; but it is already plain that colonial bowling is to the taste of Mr. MORDAUNT.

A POPULARITY-HUNTING MAGISTRATE.

It is nothing less than a public misfortune that the jury at the Central Criminal Court last Saturday should have been unable to agree upon a verdict in the case of Police-Constable RUSSELL. RUSSELL was prosecuted for perjury at the instance of the Treasury because Mr. MONTAGU WILLIAMS had refused to believe his evidence on a charge of drunkenness and disorderly conduct. Mr. WILLIAMS, to whose behaviour in this matter we have already referred, made such exceedingly strong observations about RUSSELL and his story that the legal advisers of the Crown were almost compelled to direct the institution of criminal proceedings. The result, which every Londoner has cause to regret, cannot be very satisfactory to Mr. MONTAGU WILLIAMS. For Mr. WILLIAMS treated the question as perfectly free from doubt, whereas the jury doubted so much that they could not arrive at any conclusion. The magistrate stands condemned of the most culpable levity and recklessness in going out of his way to launch accusations which may conceivably be true, but which were certainly not so obviously true as to justify him in making them. The point cannot be left in its present state of perplexity, and RUSSELL will have to be tried again at the next Sessions. But it is a very serious thing, quite apart from the circumstances of this particular case, that magistrates should attack the police without being perfectly sure of their ground. The issue before Mr. WILLIAMS was simple enough, for both sides told a plain tale. RUSSELL said that the defendants, Mr. and Mrs. BAKER, were drunk, and that they endeavoured to rescue their niece, HANNAH WILLIAMS, from his lawful custody. They said that they were sober, that RUSSELL assaulted the girl by slapping her in the face, and afterwards treated them with shocking brutality at the police-station. If Mr. WILLIAMS believed the defence, or if he felt any reasonable hesitation as to where the truth lay, it was of course his duty to discharge the defendants, as in fact he did. It was not his duty, but quite the reverse, to rush at once into the theory that RUSSELL had wilfully forsworn himself. Mr. WILLIAMS might condescend to take a lesson from the practice of the superior Courts. It sometimes, though not very often, happens that at the close of a civil or criminal trial the judge orders a witness to be indicted for perjury. But if he does so he is rightly very cautious and guarded in his language, lest he should prejudice the accused person with another tribunal. The proceedings against RUSSELL at the Old Bailey, if they showed nothing else, showed at least that Mr. MONTAGU WILLIAMS was hasty and premature. Witnesses unconnected with the police swore that the BAKERS were drunk on the night in question, and HANNAH WILLIAMS admitted, under cross-examination, that she had been in two public-houses that evening. HANNAH WILLIAMS must be presumed to have spoken the truth about herself. RUSSELL'S witnesses may, of course, have been mendacious or mistaken. It is sufficient for our purpose that Mr. WILLIAMS went much too far and too fast.

Mr. MONTAGU WILLIAMS is a very clever man. In point of ability, indeed, he has few equals, and no superiors, on the magisterial Bench. But he has fallen into a bad habit of playing to the gallery and of truckling to the professional enemies of law and order. The people who think it funny to call the Metropolitan Police "WARREN'S men," and who regard it as rational to assume that a constable is always in the wrong, assailed Mr. WILLIAMS with great bitterness when he was appointed to his present position. He had not been many days on the Bench when he came into collision with the police, he has since engaged in repeated encounters with them, and his old enemies have plied him with fulsome flattery as the people's magistrate. We are quite aware that there is nothing easier in the world than to recommend impartiality, and nothing more difficult than to be impartial. A policeman's evidence is entitled to no more weight than that of any other respectable man. But, on the other hand, the very onerous labours of the London police, and the admirable way in which, as a rule, they perform them, ought to protect them from a license of imputation which, if employed against private individuals, would excite a perfect storm of popular anger. Sir THOMAS CHAMBERS, who presided at the trial of RUSSELL, has administered justice in the Central Criminal Court, first as Common Serjeant and afterwards as Recorder, for more than thirty years. Not one of HER MAJESTY'S judges can boast of so long an experience in the working of the criminal law. The Recorder is, we need hardly say, entirely unconnected with the force over which Sir CHARLES WARREN presides. He was not even appointed by the Government, which has control of the Metropolitan Police, but by the Corporation of London, which has a police force of its own. He says that he has only tried one case of perjury against a Metropolitan Police constable, and then the man was properly convicted. That is a very striking fact, and one which may keep Mr. MONTAGU WILLIAMS more prudent in the future. No punishment can be too severe, none which the law authorizes would be severe enough, for a policeman who deliberately brought a false charge. It is one of those crimes which strike at the root of all confidence in social arrangements, and a body in which it proved to be common would have to be disbanded forthwith as an intolerable nuisance to the community. But in proportion as the offence is a heinous one, the responsibility for imputing it is grave. It would be wrong to say a word which could affect in the slightest degree, one way or another, the second trial of Constable RUSSELL. The fact, however, will remain that a stipendiary magistrate, a trained lawyer, a man exceptionally well acquainted with criminal procedure, has assumed the testimony of a policeman to be clearly and wilfully false, when independent witnesses can be found to depose that it was strictly and literally true. If such indiscretion were common, Sir CHARLES WARREN'S task, always difficult, would become almost impossible.

SIR BARTLE FRERE.

The statue to Sir BARTLE FRERE unveiled by the PRINCE of WALES was assuredly thoroughly deserved. Granted that in the present state of sculpture a statue is the most fitting memorial of a distinguished Englishman, then the Chief Commissioner of Scinde, who showed such noble courage and sound political faculty in the great crisis of the Mutiny, was amply entitled to one. Errors of speech and of judgment at the end of his career may be, and ought to be, forgotten. His claim to memory is not only his lofty personal character, but the work he did as one of the band of Englishmen who, when they were taken by surprise by the revolt of their own army, saved India by resolute good sense and undoubted courage. The unpopularity he incurred at the end of his life was one of the most curious freaks of the philanthropic and unpatriotic fad-mongers of the day. That they should have hated his courage and devotion to his country was natural; but in attacking him they were attacking one who held their own avowed humanitarian creed in a high degree. If Sir BARTLE FRERE had been what his enemies said he was, a Viceroy merely intent on extending the Empire, he would never have incurred their wrath by trying to break up the "celibate man-killing "machine" which formed CETEWAYO's army. A cold-blooded politician would probably have thought it better to let the Zulus wash their spears in the blood of the Boers and have allowed the whites of the Transvaal to shoot the Zulus, with the certainty that their mutual slaughter would destroy inconvenient rivals and clear the road for the extension of the British power. He did not take this course, because it was offensive to his humanity. He interfered in the Transvaal and in Zululand from the motives which made him zealous in his Zanzibar mission to secure the suppression of the slave trade. The course he preferred would have secured peace and good order in South Africa. He could not foresee the military errors and disasters which were to upset his plans. It was more of an error on his part that he did not fully realize the nature of the change (the temporary change, let us hope) which had come over the spirit and policy of his country since his youth.

There was, however, this amount of justification for the attacks made on him—that he was a survivor and representative of the high-spirited men who made the British Empire in India, and who were naturally hateful to such as fear the dangers and responsibilities of empire. The PRINCE OF WALES reminded his hearers that Sir BARTLE FRERE was the first of the Company's cadets who came out to India by the Overland route. When he reached his post in 1834 he went into a world which has very completely passed away. Only extreme ignorance or dishonesty of mind would cause any man to assert that the British rule in India was aggressive or reckless in its disregard of the rights of the native. Every advance we have made in India since CLIVE defended Arcot has been forced on us by European or native enemies. Still the advance was continuous, and it was directed by men who, being shut off from home, were compelled to act on their own responsibility—supported by the well-grounded conviction that what they honestly did for the good of their country would be approved and confirmed by their masters. In such a school men grew resolute and self-reliant. The effect of the training was seen on all sides in the Mutiny, and nowhere more conspicuously than in Scinde, where Sir BARTLE FRERE was High Commissioner. He and his staff deprived themselves of the troops thought necessary for their defence in time of peace, took their lives in their hands, and ran the risk of massacre in order to reinforce the army of the Central Provinces. It was in the same spirit of self-reliant statesmanship that he made the attack on CETEWAYO, in order to avert what he believed would have been a dishonourable misfortune to his country. But, though he had remained the same, his country had changed. It may be doubted whether England will ever again be served by men of this stamp. English Viceroys, Commissioners, and Governors can no longer act for themselves as they did. They are controlled from home incessantly, and moreover have been taught that they may be thrown over, and sacrificed to serve a party political turn. After this experience men will be cautious, if not timid. The new order may be as good as the old, but it will assuredly be different. Sir BARTLE FRERE belonged to the old order, and as one of its last surviving and best representatives, his memory deserves to be honoured.

MR. MORLEY AT ST. JAMES'S HALL.

A MEETING held "to condemn the Irish policy of the "Government" selects a subject the "possibilities" of which, once no doubt considerable, are now to a large extent exhausted. Even Mr. MORLEY, addressing the London Liberal and Radical Union upon it, cannot be said to have scored a success. There are, after all, only two things which can be said in dispraise of the administrative policy of any Government in any part of the world—that it is censurable on moral grounds, and that it is politically a failure. Of course you may illustrate both these propositions at any length you please, or, if there are no really appoaite illustrations at hand, you may invent as many as you can; but even of this exercise there must some day come an end, and that end is greatly accelerated when it is difficult to get hold of any illustration of the former of these propositions which does not cut your fingers. Mr. GLADSTONE has had to drop a whole series of examples of the administrative wickedness of the Government for just this very unpleasant reason, doing so on the last occasion, indeed, in a mood of such uncontrolled vexation as to expose even the sanity of his proceedings to suspicion. Mr. MORLEY is apparently conscious of his leader's deep discomfiture on the unlucky question of increasing sentences on appeal, and he has been anxiously scrutinizing the Return obtained by one of his officious Radical friends to see if there is any possibility of "distinguishing" between the fourteen cases in which Irish Law Courts enhanced sentences under Mr. GLADSTONE'S Administration and those in which the same course has been taken during the present Government's term of office. As yet Mr. MORLEY has had but little luck, having succeeded only in showing that one out of the fourteen increases of sentence was the mere rectification of an irregularity in the Court below. He has, however, indicated the line of excuse which he and his party are apparently meditating. He wants to know, he says, whether all these cases were increases of sentences of imprisonment by a County Court judge or appeals from a Court of Summary Jurisdiction under the Crimes Act. "That," he says, "was our point." With submission it was not their point, or anything like it. Their point was not that Irish County Court judges harshly or oppressively exercised their judicial discretion to increase punishment in a particular class of cases in which they should have adopted, if they did not reduce, the sentence of the Court below. It was much more than this. It was that they subserviently and almost corruptly strained, if not violated, a "constitutional" principle of general application all through the criminal law. This is a charge which can have from its very nature no association with any particular tribunal. What is unconstitutional in one Court must be unconstitutional in another. So far as the present Government is concerned, the Irish Court of Exchequer has disposed for ever of the absurd "unconstitutional" cry. What Mr. MORLEY, like Mr. GLADSTONE, has still to deal with is the damning fact that the men who pretended to believe that the cry had some meaning had themselves for a score of years past been guilty of taking advantage of these monstrous judicial outrages on the rights of the subject in their own Executive prosecution of offenders.

The attempt or inchoate attempt to get his chief out of a most awkward mess was almost the only novel contribution made by Mr. MORLEY to the great theme of the moral wickedness of the Irish policy of the Government. The rest was made up of the usual complaints, so distressingly unworthy of a man of Mr. MORLEY'S opinions, against the cruelty of treating such prisoners as Mr. DILLON—men who have been welcomed to the houses of the judges of the land and of the great dignitaries of the Church—in precisely the same way as we treat prisoners who have not enjoyed the honours of such distinguished hospitality. It is painful to note the degeneration which the austere Republicanism of "equality" has undergone in the minds of Mr. MORLEY and his school under the corrupting influences of party warfare. They have, indeed, reason for that wish which is father to the thought that the Irish policy of the Government has failed, and that its failure will soon relieve its opponents from a position which seems to be so fatal to all their recognized political principles and traditional political virtues. This point, however—of the political failure of this morally wicked policy—Mr. MORLEY touched on very lightly indeed, in only a few sentences at the beginning of his speech. We have his word for it that the Government are only driving discontent a little deeper "beneath the surface, and that the desire for Home Rule "is not one whit less active or less alive in Ireland than it "was two years ago." Its activity and vitality, as distinct from the activity and vitality of the desire on the part of some Irishmen to possess their neighbours' property, was always a very doubtful point. We shall be quite content to wait and see, which we soon shall, whether there is any connexion between them at all.

PROCEDURE IN THE HOUSE OF LORDS.

LORD CADOGAN'S motion for a Select Committee "to examine and report upon those Standing Orders "of the House of Lords which relate to the conduct of "business" has been judiciously given precedence of the Bill bearing on the constitution of the House which is to be introduced by the PRIME MINISTER. Some of us, indeed, may be of opinion that the one might well have preceded the other by a considerably greater interval of time than will, in fact, be interposed between them, and that the effect of a reform of the Standing Orders of the House might with advantage have been given time to disclose itself before any attempt was made at a reconstitution, even on the most limited scale, of the House itself. There can, at any rate, be no doubt that, whatever be the character and scope of the PRIME MINISTER'S proposals, they cannot in any wise diminish the necessity of the inquiry which is to be instituted by Lord CADOGAN'S Committee. No one can pretend that the Standing Orders of the House are so framed at present, or are, at any rate, so enforced, as to promote efficiency in the discharge of the duties of that high Assembly; and it is certainly desirable that no such obstacles to efficiency as are completely within the jurisdiction of the House, and easily removable without the possibility of raising any constitutional difficulty, be allowed to remain.

At the same time, we are not prepared to deny that there is force in one or two of Lord GRANVILLE'S criticisms on the speech of the LORD PRIVY SEAL, though the rather grudging tone of the Opposition leader's remarks—accustomed as we are to the fact that on all questions of this kind the most obstinate Toryism may always be found on the Liberal side of the House—is hardly to be commended. We quite agree with him that considerable care will be required in dealing with the question of a "quorum," even if it be, as it no doubt is, out of the question to leave it at the present too modest minimum of three; and we are further inclined to approve what Lord GRANVILLE says about the position of the Chancellor in the House, and the inexpediency, or at any rate the superfluity, of the proposal to give him the powers of the Speaker of the House of Commons. In the Upper House the question of "order," in its sense of highest importance to an assembly graced by the presence of a CONYBEARE and a TANNER, is one of almost infinitesimal concern, and it is scarcely worth while to alter the rule for the mere sake of creating an authority entitled to select between two or more peers in the rare instances of such a competition "for the floor." Lord GRANVILLE'S fears, however, as to the Chancellor's repute for impartiality, if such a power were conferred upon him, appear a little overstrained. His decision in such a case could hardly be less "suspect" of party motives than in his action—of which there has been at least one quite recent example—in moving, when he is one of the competitors, that he shall himself be heard, putting the question from the woolsack, declaring it carried in the affirmative, and delivering the speech accordingly.

The most important, however, of all the subjects of inquiry which the Select Committee can entertain is undoubtedly that relating to the question of attendance. In connexion with this question Lord CADOGAN observed that, "though perhaps some of their lordships might not "be aware of it, it was within the power of the House "to enforce the attendance of its members, not only at "Committees, but also at any other time during the "legislative business of the House." It is needless to point out the power which this rule gives for disposing, in the simplest and least invidious way, of one of the most difficult of all the questions which have arisen with respect to the so-called "reform of the House of Lords." Taken in connexion with the suggestion that a minimum of attendances should constitute the right to vote, it suggests possibilities of the utmost value.

CIDER.

IT is surprising that of the three principal European beverages, wine, beer, and cider, so little attention has been paid to cider in comparison with the other two. Wine is ancient and classical, and was no doubt the first invention to cheer the heart of man. It was a simple and natural thing to do, to press the fruit for the sake of drinking the juice, to keep the juice awhile and thus discover that there was a cheerfulness imparted to it, to keep it a little longer and find it vinegar and disappointment, and then to invent the method of staying it at the cheerful stage and preventing it from proceeding to the sour and vinegar stage. The process of distilling must have come long after this, and if it had never been discovered the sobriety of man might not have been alarmed by such a meaningless medley of words as the Blue Ribbon Gospel Total Abstinence Association. To this day grapes are pressed by the naked feet of women dancing on the masses of fruit to the sound of the fiddle and the lascivious pleasing of the lute, a custom which must be very ancient. The proper making of wine is an art demanding great skill, and the juice of all fruit is so delicate, the chemical changes are so subtle, that a long experience and considerable ingenuity are required to prepare it for transport from the place where it is made to other climes. There are few wines that do not taste far better where they are made than elsewhere, and there are many very delicious wines that are never tasted out of their own country. The art of wine-making has been brought to the greatest perfection at Bordeaux, and it is from thence that the pure juice of the grape is carried to other countries and drunk in a perfect state.

What a fine national beverage we should have if the same pains and skill had been bestowed on cider! Cider is an innocent and delicious drink, with a much lower alcoholic strength than most natural wines, and far better than all the common wines below those of a high class. It is in general use in the Western counties, Devonshire, Somersetshire, and Herefordshire especially. It is commonly made and drunk on the premises; that is to say, there is an orchard on every farm, large or small, and the cider is made for the family use, including the men employed. This is what is called rough cider, and the quality depends on the situation and the season. On large farms, or at the squire's mansion, it is often when just made put into an enormous cask, constructed by a professional cooper within the cellar, much too large ever to have been put into or taken out of the cellar, and then drawn off the lees for use; there is no better way of drinking cider than this, a case in which the liquor after having been made is not moved at all; and your real West-country cider-drinker likes his cider with no nonsense about it, sometimes giving a preference to it when it is what he calls rash—the word being applied to the cider, and not to the drinker, as the ignorant might suppose. There are many definitions of a gentleman, of which "to set in the chimbley cornder, drink zider, and cuss" is one to be heard of to the westward. Whether it is particularly human to like variety in eating, but to become strongly attached to the accustomed beverage in drinking, we will only hint to the psychologist and physiologist; but certain it is that the fondness for cider in cider countries is extreme, and its alcoholic strength is not enough to make it injurious. It is recommended for gout, and is well known to the aforesaid Westward to be a complete cure for all the ills that flesh is heir to. Two men have been known to sit down before a hogshead of cider and not leave it till it was empty, being none the worse for it. Can anything more be said in the praise of cider?

Mr. H. Stopes has recently published a book on cider; and the Royal Agricultural Society's Journal, 1888, Vol. XXIV., Part I., just published, contains a report on "Recent Improvements in Cider and Perry-making, by Mr. D. R. Chapman," which fully explains the whole process. It would appear by these publications that cider is coming into vogue, and well it may, for there seems to be no good reason why such quantities of low quality wines should be imported from France and Germany, while there is at home what we venture to say is a finer fruit from which a better beverage is made, always excepting the higher class of wines. We have heard of cider, in the early part of this century, made entirely of the golden pippin, a delicious apple, unhappily extinct, worn out by constant grafting, and this cider may have rivalled any wines. There is the cider made for home consumption, and the cider made for sale; and presuming that the cider made for sale is well and honestly made, which is usually the case, there is still a great difference in the two. The orchard affords a very profitable crop, even if a really fine apple season comes but once in three or four years, and in these days of agricultural depression to promote the cultivation of apples and the consumption of cider is a benefit to mankind. The apple-tree takes some years to get into good bearing, and the right sorts are not easily obtained; facts which may certainly account for a great deal of neglect in the growth of this crop. But it is well worth while to plant the trees, well worth while to get grafts from the best sorts, and well worth while to pay more attention to cider-making than has ever been paid before. Mr. Chapman, in his Report to the Royal Agricultural Society, gives a list of the favourite apples in the cider counties used for making cider. They should be apples which ripen towards the end of October, that the temperature may not be too hot or too cold for the fermenting processes. A certain selected variety of sorts is now preferred, but in the case of the golden pippin the finest cider was made from one sort only, and it is probable that the wine-growing countries can correct us in this particular. The orchards of Devonshire, Somersetshire, and Herefordshire are gorgeous to behold twice a year, when they are in blossom and when the fruit is ripe, the branches laden with rich reds, yellows and browns, and the air sweetened with the fruity scent. The fruit should be very carefully picked, or allowed to drop on very soft ground, and placed in small heaps to ripen fully, great care being taken that no rotten apples are used. On some farms rotten apples are used freely, an economical superstition which, like all other superstitions, is wholly condemned by the holders of the true faith in cider. Another heresy is that a little water improves the cider, which is also an economical superstition. When ready the apples are crushed, and this is best done by the old-fashioned granite-stone roller and trough. In the modern contrivances iron and lead may come in contact with the juice, which is bad for the cider and the cider-drinker. When the apples are well broken up they are placed in large wooden tubs—a wine-butt with the head taken out is a very good receptacle—and allowed to stay twelve to twenty-four hours or more, during which time a scum is thrown up, and the broken apples assume a brown colour, which is imparted to the cider. The broken apples, called "math," "cheese," or "cake," according to the county, are then pressed in a press constructed for the purpose, several layers, separated by haircloth or very clean straw, being pressed together, and the juice as it runs out is caught and transferred to tubs, sherry hogsheads and sherry butts, with the head out being preferred, when the process of fermentation takes place. Small farmers do not keep a press, but take their math or their apples, as the case may be, to a public press, or pound as it is sometimes called. The cider cannot, however, be so carefully made as it is in a press kept by the maker himself. For home use the fermentation is allowed to go pretty far, and the cider so much esteemed by the natives is produced. It used to be freely sold by the publican, and a man could go to a public-house, drink his cider and have his talk, and go home none the worse. But now beer and spirits, adulterated, pay the publican much better than simple cider, making a man more thirsty in lieu of quenching his thirst, and cider has gone out of fashion with him—the more is the pity. The cider which is made for sale, bottled in champagne bottles, and sometimes sold as champagne cider, though sparkling cider would be a much better term, is more carefully prepared. The fruit is selected for the purpose from the best sorts, and the juice after having been pressed out is racked from cask to cask, and treated with sulphur to check fermentation, as all wines are treated at Bordeaux. The use of sulphur is locally and contemptuously called matching, for your real cider-drinker likes his liquor sharp and stringent, despising the soft sweet cider of the stranger. Sulphur has the effect of destroying the vitality of the yeast, and is used freely in making the clarets and the delicious Sauternes of the Garonne. In the following spring of the year, the cider having been pressed the previous autumn, it is ready for sale in casks or bottles. It is sometimes sweetened for the public taste, as in the case of champagne, when the finest sugar is used, and if bottled properly, whether sweetened or not, it will effervesce as champagnes do. Bottled sparkling cider is the best beverage for India, far more wholesome than champagne or pale ale, probably from its lower alcoholic strength, and is very much in demand there. The price is ridiculously low in comparison with champagne, and always excepting the finest brands, which however may be rivalled, it is a better drink. A second Bass should arise in Devonshire and devote his life to making cider for the benefit of man. From the valleys of the Exe, the Dart, and the Tamar, where the best cider is now made, a sparkling liquor might copiously flow which so-called total abstainers might greet with favour, and the heart (or mind is it?) of man might be cheered and not inebriated.

OF TIME AND PLACE.

We are a little afraid that "A Friend of Humanity," who is said to have addressed a letter to Mr. Gladstone suggesting that both the Irish difficulty and the invasion scare might be profitably settled by the institution of a trinity of English, Irish, and French Republics, with a protectorate over the three for France, is not an entirely serious politician. He may even be suspected of being a kind of farceur; not that his proposition is much more absurd than many which come weekly from Mr. Gladstone's correspondents* and admirers, but that there are certain characteristics about it which give pause to the suspicious. "Friend of Humanity" is, unfortunately, a term known in history and literature, and other signs which it is unnecessary to particularize lead us to the same conclusion. But, if the "Friend of Humanity" had been a real one, what flames would he, unwitting and unthinking, have kindled in certain perfervid Northern breasts! "Three Republics—France, Great Britain, and Ireland" —quotha! And what is to become of dear old Scotland? what of poor little Wales? Are they to be left to the brutal bondage of a Paper Union with England? The "Friend of Humanity" (if he had been, &c.) would have proved himself deaf to some of the noblest and loudest heart-beats that ever throbbed in a nation's manhood (we think—we modestly think—that that phrase is rather good for mere cynics and Unionists) by this base forgetfulness. But it must be admitted that he would have puzzled his correspondent, who could hardly have helped committing himself rather further in respect of the very interesting prospect of "restoring the Heptarchy" than he has hitherto done, certainly than he has done in his reply this same week to some lunatics, or some patriots, who have been holding a Home Rule meeting for Scotland.

This latter [illegible], which appears to be a genuine answer to a genuine letter, deserves a little study. For Home Rule for Scotland is really a very interesting subject. It was inevitable that, when the question of Home Rule for Ireland was started, the perfervider sort of Scotchman should at once decide their own old Scotland must not be behindhand in the race for freedom. But so it is that your average Scotchman, though in some points, such as Mr. Gladstone, "Liberal principles," and so forth, he show not as much practical wisdom as might be desired, is far from being a fool. And not being a fool, he knows that Home Rule for Scotland, in any sense other than a mere play upon words, means, if not ruin, yet serious loss for his country. And so the wiser heads even of the Scotch Gladstonian party have done their very best to keep this Home Rule nonsense down, or to make it practically meaningless, by assigning to "Home Rule for Scotland" a meaning which would be equally unsatisfactory to the proud descendants of the victors of Bannockburn and unobjectionable to those unhappy sons of the vanquished, who (as we can inform H-s Gr-ce the D-ke of Arg-ll, from our own practice) always burst into tears when the railway carries them past the neighbourhood of that sacred spot. Of late, however, the fools have been, if not getting the upper hand, yet getting to the upper part of the froth, according to their natural specific gravity. The person who is now contesting the Ayr Burghs as a Gladstonian has declared for Scotch Home Rule, with the curious proviso that "they must wait till England"—which, it seems, is "lagging" behind—"comes up"; a somewhat mysterious sentence, which seems to mean that they must wait till England goes into a lunatic asylum. But before this a meeting had been held in London itself on the same subject. Dr. Clark, of the Transvaal Committee, presided, and there were present that ardent Scotchman Mr. Bottomley Firth, Mr. Cunninghame Graham, Professor Blackie, and so forth. Mr. Gladstone had been asked; but Mr. Gladstone thought that his attendance "in his peculiar position" ("in my situation," as Miss Bell Black has it) might "give rise to prejudicial misapprehension."

Now this is a phrase which we like very much indeed. It has not the defects observable in some other phrases, if not of Mr. Gladstone, yet of Gladstonians during the week. On Monday night Mr. Healy spoke of some one "throwing dirty water by a side wind" on a brother member—a phrase which, in our character of critics, we cannot approve. Previously the remarks of Mrs. Costelloe, M.W.W.L.A., and of Mr. Conway, M.P., seem to have been conceived in a spirit or couched in a phraseology open to similar cavil. Mr. Conway said that the Southampton election was "the keystone of the downfall of the Conservative party." How does a downfall have a keystone? and what does that keystone look like? Mrs. Costelloe, M.W.W.L.A. (Member of the Westminster Women's Liberal Association), was, as became a Liberal Westminster Woman, more prodigal of her imagery. "Woman's influence," she observed, "had always been looked on as something soft. Well, a snowflake was a very soft thing; but, if enough snow fell, it could block up cities and break telegraph-wires. In the same sense, one woman could not do much; but, properly organized, women could do anything they desired." Ce que femme veut, we all know. Otherwise it would be interesting to know how many women it takes to block up a city or break down a telegraph-wire. Fancy a shower of women, a blizzard of beauty! Fancy a west wind arising and steadily blowing up soft, properly-organized women, till they blocked up cities and broke down telegraph-wires! But we are not quite certain that the fancy is proper; and it must, whether it be so or not, rest on the head, the, we are sure, properly-organized and not at all soft head, of Mrs. Costelloe. Mr. Gladstone, it will be observed, does not indulge in these flowers of speech. He does not throw dirty water by a side wind like Mr. Healy, or point proudly to the keystone of a downfall like Mr. Conway, or conjure up Mahommedan visions of showers, not of frogs or anything nasty, but of soft, properly-organized women, like Mrs. Costelloe (N.B. Charles de Sévigné once had a vision something like this, and his adorable mother does not scruple to register it). Mr. Gladstone is about as plain as Mr. Gladstone ever can be. If in his peculiar position he were to attend a Scotch Home Rule meeting, it might give rise to prejudicial misapprehension. That is all.

No doubt it might; but the full import of the sentence (despite the absence of the distracting graces of such imagery as Mr. Healy's side winds blowing, like the pictures of the winds in the old Virgils, dirty water, and Mr. Conway's Martin-like drawings of keystoned downfalls, and Mrs. Costelloe's streets just blocked with soft, properly-organized women) may still escape the not careful reader. It illustrates a very interesting psychological moment in the History of the Politician. That poor man is simply forced to disregard a salutary proverb, and to show half-done work to a world in which political children are numerous and political fools not much rarer. We all know how Mr. Gladstone, charged with his sudden tergiversation in the matter of Irish Home Rule, indignantly, if not triumphantly, challenged his revilers to find a single passage in which, for no matter how many years, he had definitely pronounced against Home Rule. Had the game gone the other way, had that compact between Home Rulers and Tories which, we fear, does not exist even as a genuine belief anywhere, existed in fact, Mr. Gladstone would have triumphantly referred another set of accusers to his statements of the same number of years, and asked whether there was anything in these definitely pronouncing for Home Rule. And now even the political baby must be beginning to understand the meaning of the "peculiar position" and the "prejudicial misapprehensions." If Mr. Gladstone had gone to the meeting, even if he had written an [illegible] of opinion about its purpose, good-bye to the future possibility of repeating the same little game which has been played in the Irish matter. He must have been, whatever he said, prejudicially misapprehended in the future, else he must have expressed himself in such a manner as to be prejudicially misapprehended in the present. How much better to hold the tongue of silence and prepare the retort of innocence!

This is what we call considering Time and Place in politics. There are others, we are told, who "call it hellish," or, at any rate, call proceedings of a not very different kind hellish, but not we. What we admire in Mr. Gladstone, and what we regret to see ignored both by his admirers and great part of his dislikers, is the excellent adaptation of means to ends and to circumstances which always distinguishes him. There is, perhaps, no more cruel calumny recorded in history than the popular Gladstonian myth that Mr. Gladstone is a guileless being, overflowing with love of justice and human nature, too too impulsive (as the Elizabethans would have said if they had used the word impulsive), too too eager for the sacred combat. This estimate does gross wrong to a really consummate politician of his own kind. "How perfectly does he discern the fit moment," if we may quote Hypatia to the present generation, not indeed for "stabbing Stilicho"—it is the other wing of the party that does the actual clumsy stabbing—but for these equally ingenious, equally important, and much more delicate manœuvres. When the Scotch Home Rulers have got together a sufficient majority of members and of votes, when it is sure that they will not in an unmannerly fashion demand their portion of the goods of the Empire, and a handsome bonus over, till the Irish have been served with theirs, and got rid of, when it is clear either that the English electorate proper is mastered by the foreign elements in its midst, or drugged and doctored by the faddists—then Mr. Gladstone's peculiar position will admit of his appearing and speaking on the subject. But until then prejudicial misapprehension might fasten on his peculiar position, and that would never do. Compare the silence of his last month or so—broken only by a few querulous utterances in Parliament, just to keep the party together—with the torrent of welcome to excursionists last week at Hawarden, a torrent set free by Southampton. Take his conduct on the licensing clauses, the conduct of a man who is more bound than any man in England to give the fullest compensation in such a case. And when any one has taken and compared all this, if he does not agree that Mr. Gladstone is a very clever man, then all we can say is, that we shall consider him in his turn a very uncivil person and a very unfair one.

CANARIES.

THE endeavour to rescue from obscurity the story of the evolution of the various races of domesticated canaries would be at once thankless and impossible; impossible, because of the scarcity of evidence, and thankless, because all theorizing on the subject would be keenly and bitterly disputed. But of the ancestors of our tame birds three facts may be accepted as fairly certain—first, that they were green; next, that they were good songsters; and, third, that they came from the Canary Islands. Although these statements have all been denied, the balance of evidence is decidedly in their favour. Daines Barrington, eager to prove that the songs of birds are not inherited, but learnt, declared, somewhat hastily, his belief that the wild canaries of the islands are mute—an assertion certainly not true to-day, and in all probability not true in his day either. Other writers have maintained that the ancestral birds were yellow, and came from Tyrol; but they have failed to find any still existing wild species of the kind to support their theory. Humboldt remarked, not without an implied inference, that the yellow birds which he saw in cages at Tenerife had been imported from Cadiz and other places in Spain. But all the early writers—writers of the sixteenth century—who have mentioned tame canaries agree that they were green and that they sang beautifully. "Sonus emissus omnino gracilis," wrote Gesner in 1555, "tamque vibrans est ut cum parvos faucium aliquando nervos intenderit, auscultantium aures tereti quasi clangore percellat et obtundat"; and a German epigrammatist of the same date observes that no one need wonder at the enchanting sounds produced by an organ, with its numerous pipes, because

> Gramineis herbis æqua colore, dedit.

The large ungainly woodcut in the Ornithology of Aldrovandus, published in 1599, and the neatly executed engraving in the Uccelliera of Olina, published in 1622, represent a bird in shape not unlike the wild canary of the present day. Of coloured pictures none have been preserved; but, if further evidence of original greenness be wanted, we have it in the singular fact, well known to breeders, that richness of colouring in any variety can only be increased by an occasional cross with the green birds, which are regarded as the "fountain of colour." There is a fable that the vessel carrying the first instalment of wild birds from the Canary Islands was wrecked, and that the birds escaped to the island of Elba, where they multiplied amazingly until thinned down by capture and domestication. Although we may not be able to accept this romance as fact, on the whole the evidence is tolerably clear that the wild canary is the real ancestor of our pets.

But when we come to consider by what steps the evolution of so many varieties from a single stock has been effected, we have neither records nor tradition to assist us. The story is wrapped in as great a mystery as the Dorian and Pelasgian migrations in the early days of Greece. Whether the modern varieties are entirely due to methodical selection—the view favoured by Darwin—or to the intercrossing of the canary with other species of the Fringillidæ, we only know for certain that the agency which produced the varieties was remarkably rapid in its action. At the beginning of the sixteenth century the canary was unknown in Europe. In 1709 a "new treatise" on canaries was published in Paris by one Hervieux de Chanteloup, who gave a list of twenty-seven varieties. He divided the species into seven main classes—Gris, Blond, Jaune, Agate, Isabelle, Blanc, and Panaché—and subdivided these into minor classes according as the birds had down (duvets), white tails, red eyes, and so forth. What colours his names were intended to signify can never be known, because, unfortunately, he added no descriptions to his bare list; but it is possible that the birds with down (aux duvets) were those now known as buffs, or mealies, and there is little doubt that the Panachez were birds with crests.

In 1779 the Hand-in-Hand Canary Society published a list of the standard qualities of a variety which was, no doubt, that now known as the London Fancy; and this is the earliest definite record of any variety still in existence. Since those days the taste of the London fanciers has changed. Black legs and black underfeathers, which were then standard properties, are now as rigidly tabooed as the dark mottling, miscalled "spangle," which was once so essential. The London Fancy canary, moreover, is no longer a favourite with breeders; there are not many in existence, and even at the larger shows few prizes are allotted to them.

At the exhibition recently held at the Crystal Palace prizes were offered for forty-seven distinct varieties; and many other varieties could be named which were relegated to the class for "any other variety." The difference between two varieties is sometimes slight and sometimes striking. Roughly speaking, all canaries fall into ten main classes—the Norwich, beloved of fanciers, has rich colour, neat shape, and fine feathering; the Cinnamons and Greens are sufficiently described by their names; the Lizard is a dark bird, with gold or silver spangles and a yellow cap; the London Fancy is a "clear" (i.e. yellow) bird with black wings and tail; the Lancashire is a giant among canaries, with somewhat coarse feathers and an erect military attitude; the Yorkshire is extremely long and slender; the Scotch Fancy, a bird of "position," stands with its tail under the perch, resembling in outline the crescent moon, and regularity of the curve is one of its qualifications; the Belgian, another bird of "position," has hunched vulture-like shoulders, and is trained to emphasize this peculiarity in a very singular manner when its cage is tapped or scratched; and, finally, there are the Coppies and Turncrowns, the birds with crests.

These main classes are subdivided in various ways—usually into Green, Variegated (that is, having small patches of yellow), Evenly Marked (that is, having certain symmetrical black marks on the wings and about the eyes), Unevenly Marked (that is, having these marks unsymmetrical), Ticked (that is, having a slight tick or speck of dark colour), and Clear. In these last the underflue, or feathers under the surface, when ruffled by the breath or finger of the judge, must show no spot or blemish. Curiously enough, each variety, even the Green and Cinnamon, has two distinct types, formerly known as Jonques and Mealies, but now called Yellows and Buffs. The names, be it understood, are purely technical, and must not be taken as descriptive. The Yellows are distinguished by purity and depth of colour; in the Buffs the colour is obscured by a kind of down, or white edging of the feathers. This liability to appear in two distinct forms, this singular duality, pervades the whole canary tribe without exception.

That such remarkable diversity has been brought about by the steady accumulation of innumerable slight variations in given directions is not improbable. The two principles of variation (the tendency of offspring to differ slightly from their parents) and inheritance (the tendency of offspring to resemble their parents) are sufficient to account for all. This seems so simple that the task of producing a new strain might be thought an easy one. But it is complicated by all sorts of difficulties. The desired variation first makes its appearance in a single family. It can only be perpetuated by in-breeding, or "sib-breeding," as some prefer to call it. But a long course of in-breeding is injurious to canaries. It causes them to lose feather, weakens their constitution, pales their colour, and makes them unwilling to rear their young. Sooner or later crossing is necessary, and the infusion of new blood entails unlooked-for departures from the desired qualities. Atavism, or the tendency of offspring to resemble remote ancestors, comes into play; and by the law of correlated variation one peculiarity is usually accompanied by another which may not be wanted. Nor need we be surprised at the difficulty of producing a new strain when we remember that the apparently simpler problem of maintaining an existing strain unaltered is in reality quite as difficult. An ardent amateur might suppose that, in order to breed Marked or Clear-crested Norwich, all he has to do is to buy two good specimens at a show and pair them. When he finds that the nestlings present all sorts of varieties, from Lancashire coppy to marked Yorkshire, he is not a little surprised; and when further pairing results in further diversity he begins to learn that, in order to predict the result of a cross with reasonable certainty, he must know the pedigree of the paired birds. The maxim that "like begets like" is only true with this important reservation. Again, if two crested birds be paired together, the nestlings will probably have—not bald crowns as Darwin erroneously supposed—but superabundant crests. However, superabundance of crest is equally unpleasant from a fancier's point of view, and, to prevent it, crested birds have to be paired with plain heads.

In the year 1871 an important discovery was made with regard to the colouring of canaries. In that year certain birds began to be exhibited which eclipsed all competitors in richness and depth of colouring. For several years the secret was kept, its possessors meanwhile winning prizes wholesale. As the birds were of two colours, the wing and tail feathers being greenish yellow and the rest orange, the liveliest curiosity was excited as to the cause of so mysterious an effect. Foul play was suspected, and the birds were submitted to analysts, only to be reported guiltless of dye. At last the secret was discovered independently by an outsider, who, scorning the gains to be got by illiberal reticence, presented it to the world, and announced that the superb colouring was the result of feeding the birds on cayenne pepper in the moulting season! This announcement, which would doubtless be interesting to Mr. Bates and Mr. A. R. Wallace, also created a dispute as to whether any cruelty was involved in making a bird eat several teaspoonfuls a day of so sharp a condiment. Some asserted that it spoiled their digestions and ruined their constitutions; others maintained that they liked the "K. N. regimen" (as they jocularly called it), and that the Capsicum frutescens was the natural food of many wild birds; and the dispute is by no means settled yet.

THE OPERA.

ALTHOUGH there has been a general tendency to make much of the opera this season, it was not until Monday evening, when a great accession of strength arrived in the persons of MM. Jean and Edouard de Reszké and Lassalle, that anything of a specially noteworthy character occurred. The chorus had been somewhat better than of late years, the dresses decidedly fresher, and rather more than ordinary care was perhaps bestowed upon the stage management. We have no great preference for Signor Mancelli over Signor Bevignani. Both are very competent conductors, and there is a close similarity between the orchestras over which both have presided. For the rest we have had a number of familiar impersonations. The want of a tenor had been felt, as usual for many seasons past. M. Etienne de Reims made a brief visit, and yet one that was generally felt to have been too prolonged; he disappeared not a moment before audiences were ready to bid him farewell. All the labour of the tenor parts has fallen on Signor Ravelli, neither the glass of fashion nor the mould of form nor anything in the least like either, but still a competent vocalist, with a real tenor voice. We have seen Mme. Albani play Gilda and Violetta and the Contessa in Le Nozze—all very good performances; Mme. Hauk has been seen as Carmen—also very good indeed. Mme. Trebelli has played Siebel, and Mme. Scalchi Azucena. In many respects, it will be perceived, the present season has until lately resembled those of its predecessors which were not very remarkable. We have had some débutantes. Mlle. Sigrid Arnoldson was not actually a newcomer, for she sang last year at Drury Lane; but she has been heard so seldom that her position was undetermined, and we regret to find our opinion of last year decidedly confirmed. We were then quite unable to share the something like enthusiasm which the young lady's performances seemed to arouse in certain quarters, and the only alteration we note in Mlle. Arnoldson this year is that, young as she apparently is, she has already lost much of the freshness and quality of her voice. As regards her interpretation of character, we may briefly observe that Mlle. Arnoldson shows even less than the average of intelligence common to the operatic stage. Mme. Melba has valuable gifts, but before we estimate her capacity we must hear her in a less conventional part than that of Donizetti's Lucia. Mlle. Martini, who has played Verdi's Leonora, we heard without dissatisfaction or interest. Criticism should be an exact science, but there are some operatic performers who run the risk of being rated according to the mood of the critic. If he be inclined to make the best of things, to look on the brighter side, such performers are moderately praised; if at all inclined to be captious, he may with justice speak somewhat severely; and Mlle. Martini is the sort of singer who provokes these varying comments. A débutante of much promise has, however, been heard. We speak of Miss MacIntyre, a thorough novice so far as the stage is concerned, but an artist of much sensibility and a well-trained vocalist, with a very agreeable soprano voice, fresh, sweet, and sufficiently powerful. Completely ignorant as Miss MacIntyre is of the art of acting, her singing is distinguished by feeling and fervour. She created sympathy for Michaela, and entirely won the favour of the house.

On Monday night, however, the French tenor, baritone, and bass who have been mentioned appeared in L'Africaine, and a very high standard of excellence was immediately reached. M. Jean de Reszké has not the mellifluous tones of a Giuglini; a tenor who possesses these, and is gifted also with the declamatory power requisite for a Raoul, a Vasco de Gama, a Guillaume Tell, or a Lohengrin—is vainly looked for. Signor Gayarré charms many by his mezza-voce singing; but in dramatic passages, though he has the actual means, he is far from satisfactory, for he not only shouts, but does not shout strictly in tune. M. Jean de Reszké lacks the soft and tender cantabile style which used to draw audiences to Covent Garden to hear Signor Gayarré sing "Spirto gentil"; but in the chief essentials of the tenore robusto the French artist is altogether admirable. The part of Vasco has its effective episodes; as a whole, however, in all that does not relate to the discovery of new worlds, this hero is very unheroic; and Don Pedro is, dramatically speaking, even more contemptible. M. Edouard de Reszké is as good as a representative of the part can be; and M. Lassalle is the best of all possible Neluskos. Since M. Faure retired there has been no finer operatic baritone, and, superlatively good vocalist as M. Faure was, his voice at its best was not comparable with that of M. Lassalle. Mme. Nordica made a very creditable Nitika. All that careful and intelligent study can do she does. What she lacks is the inherent power which, when Mme. Lucca at her best was playing Selika, has sometimes enchained the attention of audiences, so that they have watched her with intense earnestness, forgetting, as she made her music the vehicle for the display of emotion, that this was an operatic performance, and absorbed in the action of the savage Queen. Miss MacIntyre sang the music of Inez so charmingly that we readily forgave her inexperience, and were even inclined to think that there might be excuses for making the stage of the Royal Italian Opera the scene of elementary studies in acting. Mr. Harris's stage management was not by any means conspicuously successful in L'Africaine. The boarding of Don Pedro's ship was a poor burlesque of the situation.

The tenor and bass of what may be called the great French trio have also played Faust and Mefistofele with the most excellent results. We sometimes—not seldom indeed—see Fausts whose appearance and demeanour suggest that the tempter has cheated them in his bargain. Faust confesses why he is ready to sacrifice all for the return of youth; and, as the Devil, they say, hath power to assume a pleasing shape, it must be inferred that, when he rejuvenates the philosopher, he would not make him ridiculous in aspect or invest him with the ungentlemanlike habit of singing out of tune. Faust, if he is to have his desire, must give the world assurance of a man; and we frequently see Fausts who are very far from succeeding in this. M. Jean de Reszké looks and acts and sings the part in such a way as to imply that the Devil has faithfully observed his part of the compact. The singer's art is made more admirable—conspicuous would have been a wrong description—by the fact that he most skilfully hides all sign of any effort in his singing, though we can perceive on close examination that the high tones are not always produced with perfect ease. The C in "Salve! dimora" is with him a matter of some care and calculation—in truth, we felt a little nervous about it—and there are phrases—that, for one, which introduces the A in the lovely duet "Dammi ancor" of the Garden Act—where M. Jean de Reszké's means are tried; though, on the other hand, the B flats in the fine trio of the fourth act are easily and effectively obtained, this being a forte passage, in the delivery of which vigour goes for much. In fact, his voice as a tenor is not nearly as good as that of his brother the bass; but M. Jean de Reszké vocalizes with rare art, and it is an extraordinary thing that hard work seems to benefit him. Since last heard in England he has been playing the most arduous and fatiguing parts known to contemporary audiences; but, if there is any difference, he is singing better than last year. Both brothers are gifted with the true artistic temperament which seems to prevent its fortunate possessors from committing an error of taste. We doubt whether the music of Mefistofele has ever been better sung than by M. Edouard de Reszké; for, though M. Faure was unsurpassable, his natural means were limited, and this must be taken into consideration. In his score M. Gounod has written alternative notes in certain places for the convenience of singers with lighter voices than the part requires if carried out in its integrity, but in no case is this an improvement; in fact, it is very desirable that the music should be sung as first conceived, and throughout a compass of at least two octaves M. Edouard de Reszké has one of the most extraordinarily even voices ever heard. His action and attitude have the great merit of never seeming the result of study, though always expressive and significant. The critical observer will not fail to detect the curious difference between the two French artists and Signor del Puente. The baritone is thoroughly versed in the business of the character he fills; he has a good voice, has played the part of Valentino hundreds of times, and is, as singers go, a very fair actor; yet even in his death scene, where he is necessarily the central figure of a great and impressive gathering, he never commands the stage and compels attention as do both the brothers De Reszké whenever they are present. Mme. Nordica's Margherita is a very intelligent study. It is mitigated praise to say that it is marked by evidence of care, for it should be spontaneous. Margheritas, however, though they often sing the "Re di Thule" ballad with the necessary abstraction, usually fail in the "Jewel Song," and here Mme. Nordica, like so many of her predecessors, is unsatisfactory. As a vocal exercise it is, as a rule, well enough. If singers could not render it in a manner that satisfies a certain scholastic test, they would not be trusted playing Margherita at the Royal Italian Opera; but they do not make it express what M. Gounod intends—the girlish delight, half vanity, half coquettishness, which the sight of the jewels causes. The ascending scales are not vocal exercises, but ripples of laughter. We can never make out whether prime donne do not perceive this or whether it is that they fail in the attempt to realize it; the fact remains that the song is almost invariably disappointing. Nevertheless, Mme. Nordica played the Garden-scene with feeling and a nice perception of its requirements. Mme. Scalchi's Siebel needs no description. The Italian contralto has not quite the beautiful delicacy of phrasing which is so conspicuous in the Siebel of Mme. Trebelli; but to speak of this is perhaps hypercritical, for Mme. Scalchi is a very welcome exponent of the part. Mlle. Bauermeister—who, if our memory serves us rightly, has played Marta to the Margherita of Mlle. Titiens—is as good a dame as we desire to see. A few such performances as that of Faust will do very much to revive the reputation and ensure the fortune of Italian opera.

MINOR EXHIBITIONS.

MR. LUIS FALERO'S large figure picture exhibited at the Gainsborough Gallery draws a considerable crowd, many of whom are evidently different from the ordinary gallery frequenter. People of a military or sporting type predominate. In fact, "Nightmare" cannot but interest the common carnal man. One must be solemnly convinced of one's mission to look after other people's moral tone to derive no sort of amusement from this sportive picture. Professors, prudes, and persons entangled in theories of the elevation of the masses by art will find it convenient to study the work in order to condemn the rest of the world for doing the same. Yet there is nothing indecent in the picture, except perhaps to those who consider the human female form a gross error and a barbarous anachronism, good enough for dark ages but quite unworthy of modern taste and refinement. The nude abounds; not helplessly spread on a sofa like the Nanas, Eastern slaves, and lumps of Turkish Delight to which we have been accustomed, but worked up into a big composition with an idea. Most nudes are simply studies of a model with a catch-penny title. This picture, however, is spirited, if somewhat coarse and summary, and the three fine girls swing in contorted poses like a bunch of grapes on a stalk. The serious artist will deplore a lack of subtlety in drawing and modelling; but he will not feel inclined to deny the vigour of the action, the boldness of the lighting, and the concentration of the composition. The monster who is carrying off the women is a fantastic mixture of frog and bat, an altogether disagreeable object even in a dream. No one will try and find out what the picture means; it is evidently an excuse for piling up figures in twisted and strongly marked attitudes under a fierce effect of light. It might be described as a horrible nightmare of Mr. J. Horsley, R.A., the result of an incautious visit to the Salon after dinner.

Messrs. Obach, in Cockspur Street, have got together some fine examples of the late French school. Pictures by the men of 1830 may be seen in one or two galleries in London; but the growing demand for such work has led to the exhibition of any specimen, whether good, bad, or indifferent. In this way several of the great men come to be held in light esteem by those who are unacquainted with their best work. Not to speak of plausible forgeries, Corot's sketches and scraps of all kinds have been raked up from every corner; and, though he was not a commercial artist, many of them are too slight and careless to give any one a just idea of his immense conquest of fresh matter and new style. Diaz, however, worked at times for cheap popularity, and his fame suffers more than any artist's from the endurance of his potboilers. It is pleasant, therefore, to be able to point to one of his most splendid pictures—a scheme of colour as gorgeous as any of Monticelli's, and far more satisfying and significant of air, distance, and other realities of life. "La Descente des Bohémiens" shows a string of picturesquely-dressed figures coming down a wooded forest path, such as could be found in the neighbourhood of the Gorge aux Loups or Long Rocher at Fontainebleau. Diaz's manner of giving breadth to the treatment of speckled light and shadow in a wood has been so often degraded and cheapened in mechanical "pastiches" by himself and others that one would scarcely expect to admire it, even in its pristine vigour and youth. But so noble in style, and so fresh, true, and romantic in matter is this view of the mysterious depths and flickering lights of a great forest that it sweeps away all remembrance of its kinship with meaner representations of the same thing. Nothing could be more romantic and yet more effectively and truthfully broad than the vast gloomy shadow in which one dimly perceives the straggling tail of the procession; nothing richer in suggestion than the handling of trunks, foliage, and tangled ground-growths; nothing more appropriate to the scene than the string of fantastic figures so naturally and happily introduced. This is not the only Diaz in the show, but the others, though good, seem quite insignificant in comparison. Another important canvas is a life-size figure of a peasant woman, holding a baby on her knee, by J. F. Millet. In parts, especially in the mother, we can see, in the somewhat clumsy technique, evidence of that disdain for cleverness which Millet, good workman as he had proved himself in early days, frequently exhibited when searching for the expression of his later and more personal sentiments. Signs of earnest and indefatigable grubbing after truth abound in the picture. The baby's head, on the other hand, has been painted with stylish care and suggestive sureness. Some little pictures by Daubigny, particularly a broad sketch of a rocky country, deserve attention. They show that repose of style and that sober unity of colour which make the works of this school so suitable for decorative purposes, and so eminently qualified to give distinction to any room in which they hang. Rousseau, Troyon, Ziem, and similar men, are more or less well represented by small canvases. Français, the oldest living landscape painter of note, is not very well known in England. A little picture with a bend of river, a knot of graceful trees, and, further back, a hill-side lit by a warm sun, shows his charming elegance and classic beauty of manner. Harpignies, Mauve, Israels, and others, illustrate slightly later developments of art. An excellent example of Mauve, showing a shepherd and sheep under an effect of subdued and hazy light, hangs over the staircase.

THE EDGWARE ROAD FIRE.

WHILE the events of this sad catastrophe are still fresh in the public memory, it is most important that we should endeavour to profit by some of the obvious lessons to be learned from it. There was nothing exceptional in these premises, which, like many others of the same kind, consisted of a shop and show-rooms below, and a dwelling-house above, the shop huge in extent and heavily stocked with goods, and the dwelling containing a large number of human beings. This appears to be a recognized arrangement in these monster shops; but we venture to suggest serious doubts as to its advantages, unless it is accompanied by certain precautions which are not commonly observed. The difficulty with owners of such places, no doubt, is that they desire to prevent the entrance of persons from outside by any way except that in common use. Windows are carefully barred and locked; unnecessary doors are fastened by prepared bolts and cunning obstacles; and, where other buildings adjoin, chevaux de frise or other impassable barriers are erected, and windows are armour-plated or otherwise rendered impracticable from the outside. Thieves, no doubt, are aggressive, and servants must be restrained from unauthorized excursions at night; but those who adopt elaborate precautions to prevent irregularities incur a heavy responsibility if they go too far; and it is every day becoming a more serious question whether there can be any justification for a course of proceeding which necessarily involves such fearful risks to human life in the event of a fire occurring.

There is very little doubt that in some parts of London large numbers of human beings are imprisoned every night in such a way that only a very small proportion could by any possibility escape in the event of a rush for life; but we know of hardly any cases in which the persons who take such elaborate precautions include themselves among the prisoners, and this is the point which appears to us not to have as yet received sufficient attention. Where those who have property and persons under their charge share the risks involved by their own precautions, we may perhaps acquiesce in their proceedings, believing that every measure which foresight and prudence can dictate is necessarily adopted; but where those who are responsible do not share the dangers, it must remain a very grave question how far they are justified in placing large numbers of persons under lock and key without providing all reasonable and necessary safeguards.

Of late years buildings have been erected to a much greater height than formerly; but we fail to observe any corresponding precautions for the safety of those who inhabit the upper levels, and we cannot but think that Building Acts and other laws are seriously defective which omit to provide against so great a danger. It has been long since notified to the public by the responsible authority controlling the Fire Brigade that a fire-escape cannot reach a greater height than about fifty feet, and that arrangements should be made for persons who occupy the upper levels of lofty buildings to get down externally to spots within reach of these machines, which are still the only means of escape available from the outside; but we know of very few cases in which this salutary warning has been observed. In some countries—notably America—it is by no means uncommon to find external iron ladders reaching from the roof to within twenty or thirty feet of the ground, and there seems to be no objection of any kind to this arrangement; but the most simple and useful precaution in high buildings is to provide on the outside of every story continuous balconies, connecting with each other by external stairs, and thus enabling the inmates in case of need to proceed instantly to the ground or to some level from which they can be rescued. Some excellent devices have been made during recent years for enabling a communication to be instantly established between two balconies on different levels, or between the lowest balcony of a building and the ground, and it is somewhat surprising that these simple and inexpensive appliances should not be more frequently adopted: but the fear of unauthorized entrance from the outside appears to exert a paramount influence over the minds of those who control these vast concerns. Simple wrought-iron hinged stairs, somewhat of the pattern used for the side-ladders of a ship, are all that is required. These, when not in use, could be kept fastened up by means of a small cord, and when required could be instantly lowered; and, to obviate the risk of unauthorized entrance or exit, a bell could be attached which, on the releasing of the cord, would make sufficient noise to arouse the whole neighbourhood.

Not long since an ingenious inventor proposed that the porch over the exit doors of a theatre, instead of being solid and built at a right angle into the wall, should be hinged at the inner end and fitted with steps on top. In case of emergency the outer end could be lowered by the simple act of releasing a cord, and the porch would be instantly converted into a wide staircase down which hundreds of persons could pass within a few seconds. It would be interesting to ascertain how far this subject has received the attention of those who are in the habit of locking up their assistants, and how far the imprisoned assistants are satisfied with the existing arrangements.

It is quite certain that a few of the most thoughtful firms have done much to ensure the safety of those who work or sleep on their premises. Indeed one enterprising tradesman, whose name in connexion with fires has become historic, has shown an excellent example in altogether separating his personnel and matériel, the whole of the former being domiciled in premises adjacent, but not absolutely contiguous; and, when one of the most astute and successful of his kind finds it to his interest to do this, it may fairly be inferred that, even from the commercial point of view, there is something to be said against the common practice of lodging a large number of persons on the top of a building loaded with inflammable property.

We omit here any detailed reference to the number and position of internal staircases, passages, corridors, and other means of inter-communication within the buildings, because the subject is too large to be treated within the limits of a single article; but we venture to express a hope that those who lock up large numbers of persons in the upper levels of high buildings will look to their arrangements, and put themselves in a position to prove to the public that they have taken every possible precaution for the safety of life in the event of a fire occurring.

JOHN WILLIAM INCHBOLD'S PICTURES.

On Wednesday last the pictures, drawings, and miscellaneous effects of the late John William Inchbold were disposed of by auction at Messrs. Foster's. It was one of those melancholy occasions when the entire life-work of an eccentric and unworldly artist is dragged into the light, covered with dirt and chalked with numbers, with all that is imperfect and unsatisfactory in it cruelly emphasized. In the case of Mr. Inchbold, who had been a solitary and wandering old bachelor, nothing seemed to be reserved from the cruel eye of publicity. His forks and spoons, his watch, positively his umbrellas and his tea-caddies, rubbed shoulders with the canvases into which he had poured the poetry of his aspirations. The auction on Wednesday was, to a very exceptional degree, the rehearsal of the whole tragedy of a life, and it was no small part of that tragedy that the pictures themselves, some of them individually famous in the art-life of thirty years ago, fetched the most languid and inglorious prices. Inchbold was one of those lonely and fastidious men who desire to make a reputation, and yet do nothing to help the world to know them. He rarely exhibited. The queerest stories were told of the subterfuges by which he would mystify and betray an intending purchaser. We ourselves knew an instance in which a fellow-artist, an Academician of great influence and an enthusiastic lover of Inchbold's landscapes, by dint of positive labour brought about an interview between the painter and a wealthy picture-dealer. Knowing Inchbold's slippery ways, the Academician personally conducted the dealer to his friend's lodgings, captured the latter with success, and induced him to set a number of his pictures out on chairs. But while the picture-dealer was examining the works and making his selection, Inchbold faded away like a Boojum. The visitors waited and waited, but he never came back; he had not mentioned his price, and no business could be done. Some days afterwards the Academician met Inchbold and fiercely upbraided him. "Surely," the landscape-painter replied, in his soft voice, "to have stayed would have seemed indelicate!" Such was the visionary and wholly impracticable artist who died last winter enthusiastically admired by a little group of connoisseurs, and wholly unknown to the world.

It was a misfortune for Inchbold that he became early confounded with the pre-Raphaelites, and very earnestly and awkwardly tried to do the same things that they did. Mr. Ruskin praised him in his patronizing way for his mastery of the detail of English spring, and one year, when the sage was blasting the whole Academy with Olympian disdain, he admitted that it was the case that "Mr. Inchbold has painted some wood hyacinths and gentians." Now, nothing is plainer than that Inchbold, a dreamer by nature, was not in sympathy with all the minute and niggling detail of pre-Raphaelite foreground. But he was told that it was his duty, and he did it. There was a daisy-plant, with a church behind it, sold on Wednesday, which was really a pathetic miracle. As a matter of fact, it is difficult to see much to praise in these early pictures which Mr. Ruskin commended. They were hot and heavy in colour, and inclined to be dirty, with sheer excess of manipulation. Inchbold's tones were not good at any time; they were stippled too much, and not massed enough. As to his "White Doe of Rylstone," the most ambitious of all his productions, it looks very queer, dark, and unattractive now. The [illegible] planes of various light, about which the painter took an infinitude of pains, must have suffered some chemical change. The picture is now striking, curious, but not beautiful.

There was, however, one side of his talent which he developed late and in which he is unique. There is no painter, ancient or modern, who has surpassed Inchbold in his marvellous rendering of the blue distance of the shadow-sides of large mountains in clear air. His blues and greens are opalescent, they melt into one another, they possess a purity and a magical transparence which are certainly in the gift of no other recent landscape-painter. Some of the Swiss scenes, sold on Wednesday—the "Lake of Geneva, from Pallans," the "Veptaux Gorge," and several studies of the Dent du Midi—are masterpieces of the English school of landscape-painting, which will probably outlive in value and interest most of what has been produced of a similar kind in the present generation. Inchbold had a strangely restricted gift. He never learned, on the one hand, that the world was full of things which he had no power to paint more than respectably, and he never clearly realized, on the other, that, in face of a distant snow mountain bathed in cold aërial light, of the glassy, iridescent surface of a calm lake at evening, of anything dim and mysterious which took the cool hues of an opal, he was suddenly able to do what was first-rate and excel all his contemporaries. A talent more limited than Inchbold's has rarely been seen in an original painter, and yet no one who is able to judge will deny him a place among the masters of modern landscape.

THE CROP PROSPECTS.

The weather so far this year has not been quite so unfavourable to the crops as it was in the first five months of last year, for during May there was somewhat more warmth and more rain, though both were greatly deficient. March and April, however, were exceedingly severe months, and the result is that the season is extremely backward and that there is a great want of warm rain. The matter is the more serious because we have had an insufficiency of rain during the past fifteen or eighteen months, and if the drought lasts much longer the damage done to all the crops cannot fail to be disastrous. Perhaps wheat has suffered least of all. For the most part it is grown on deep, damp soils, and it strikes its root far into the ground. Growing crops obtain their moisture from the supplies stored up in the earth as well as from falling showers; wheat, striking its roots deep, is thus able to attract more moisture from the soil than other crops when the supply so stored up is as at present very small. It is possible that, even if we were to have no rain until the harvest, wheat on the rich, deep soils would not suffer much—the crop would probably be above the average; but upon thin soils even now the wheat has suffered, as it has likewise upon ill-manured and ill-tilled lands and upon slopes that drain rapidly. The other corn crops are greatly in want of rain. If throughout the present month there is a copious rainfall and warm weather both oats and barley doubtless will greatly improve, though it is doubtful whether even then either crop would be a good one. Peas and beans have likewise suffered, and in some parts of the country the reports respecting the potato crop are likewise unfavourable; but root crops and grasses are the most affected. Roots require much moisture to attain full maturity, and so does grass; and owing to the fact already referred to, that the storage of water in the soil is much less than usual, while the root crops do not strike their roots as deep down as wheat, and are not sown in the kinds of soil that retain the most moisture, those crops are dependent just now upon the rains that may fall. Unless, therefore, we have a heavy rainfall both the root crops and the grasses will suffer. When it is recollected that nearly one-half of the whole cultivated area of this country is now laid down in grass it will be seen how very serious the matter is becoming. We have reached the season of the year when mowing ought to begin; but in only a very few places is this being done, and, whatever may happen now, it seems as if the hay crop must prove deficient. The hay crop was short last year likewise. A second deficient hay crop will inflict much loss upon farmers. Owing to the long winter and to the drought of last year the drain upon all kinds of food-stuffs for cattle has been very great, and the supply of hay therefore has run short. Consequently, farmers have been obliged to turn their cattle rather early upon the pasturages, and the permanent grasses are therefore eaten almost bare. A warm, wet June would, however, soon improve the permanent grasses as well as the green crops, and might completely change the prospects of the cereal crops. All things considered, the damage yet done is less than might have been anticipated; and it has often been proved in former years that backwardness does not imply in the result bad crops. Probably the wheat yield, both in quality and quantity, would suffer from so much rain as is required to improve the other corn crops as well as the roots and the grasses; but, with this exception, a warm, wet June, followed by plenty of warmth and sunshine in July and August, might give a fairly good harvest. It is too late, however, we fear, for any material change as respects the hay-crop.

Our experience during the current year, and last year, ought to warn those who take upon themselves to advise farmers of the extreme danger of too-confident an opinion as to the kind of farming which best pays in this country. A little while ago it was almost universally believed that tillage could not be expected to prove profitable, and that the best course for the farmer was to lay down his land as quickly as possible in grass. It may be doubted, however, whether last year the wheat-grower did not make more money than the cattle-farmer. No doubt wheat was very cheap, but the yield was large, and, as a general rule, the quality was good. Where good quality and large yield were combined the farmer obtained a fair return for his outlay, for, generally speaking, in such cases the price was higher than the quoted price. But the cattle-farmer had to struggle against the bad hay crop, difficulties of feeding, and the low prices both for meat and dairy produce. Hence some authorities are beginning to advise farmers that, whereas laying down land in permanent pasture was the most profitable policy during the wet cycle, now we have got into a dry cycle tillage-farming is more profitable. It would be rash, indeed, of farmers to act upon this advice. In this country we cannot count very long upon a dry cycle. On the contrary, since the drought has lasted already fifteen or eighteen months, the reasonable inference seems to be that it will not continue much longer. Besides, the farmer should bear in mind that there are many other considerations to be weighed quite irrespective of the character of the seasons. The real inference that should be drawn from our experience during the past year and a half is not that tillage-farming is more profitable than cattle-farming, but that a serious effort should be made to regulate and store up our water supply. During 1879 the country suffered grievous loss because of the excessive rainfall and the over-absorption of moisture in the soil; now we are suffering from an insufficiency of rainfall, and consequently from an insufficient storage of water in the soil. If the drainage of the country were such that in years like 1879 the over-supply could have been quickly got rid of from the soil and stored up for future use the farming community would have escaped much hardship. The regulation and storage of our water supply, however, is a matter which cannot be left to individual effort—it is a national concern, and by national resources alone can it be properly dealt with.

Should the drought continue the question arises whether we may anticipate a considerable rise in the price of wheat and other agricultural produce. As regards wheat, it is to be borne in mind that the crop reports from the United States—the greatest source of our supply—are bad. Undoubtedly the winter wheat crop in the United States has suffered very greatly. It is said that nearly two millions of acres have been ploughed up and resown, so great has been the failure already. But, on the other hand, the Californian crop does not appear to have suffered; while it seems certain that a largely increased area will be sown with spring wheat. Upon the whole, therefore, it is not improbable that the yield may be larger this year than last year. Last year's crop was unquestionably short, and the exports from the United States in consequence have considerably fallen off; but it is too early yet to form any trustworthy estimates as to the probable harvest. Even the winter wheat crop may improve considerably during the time that has yet to elapse before harvesting; while the reports concerning the prospects of the spring wheat crop are undoubtedly good. The Indian wheat crop appears to be considerably larger than last year's, and to be in very good condition; the Australasian crop is likewise larger, and exceedingly good reports are being received as to the prospects of the Russian crop. From all the great sources of our supply, therefore, except the United States, the reports are excellent; and concerning the United States we must always bear in mind that there is still time for a very great improvement. The crops seem good likewise in Hungary and the Danubian countries, although the drought and heat during the past week or two are said to have done damage, especially in Hungary. But in France the season is backward, just as it is in this country. Probably in the South of France the yield of wheat will be as large as last year; but in the North, East, and West it is not expected to be so good. The Italian crop is likewise reported to be deficient, and so is the German. The final result we come to, then, is that there will be an increased export of wheat both from India and from Australia; that the Russian crop will probably be as good, or nearly as good, as last year's, which was exceedingly large; and that the American crop will not be smaller, if, indeed, it is not somewhat larger. But, on the other hand, the demand is likely to be larger in France, Italy, and Germany. Should the French competition become keen it is inevitable that there must be a more or less considerable rise in price; but if the French competition is not keen prices may not move very materially. Last year's French harvest was exceedingly good, and the French demand consequently has since been small. There might, therefore, be some falling off in the yield this year in France without occasioning a very great increase in the demand. But if, as seems probable, there is an increased demand from France, Italy, and Germany, it is almost certain that there must be an upward movement in the price. We must not forget, however, that dry years always are favourable to the wheat crop, and that although the crop is now backward throughout France, Germany, and Italy, as well as here at home, the quality of the grain may prove to be excellent when the reaping time comes; and the quantity also may be larger than is expected at the present moment. Regarding other grains, there does not seem much probability of a material movement in prices; but if the drought continues, it seems almost inevitable that there must be a rise in meat. As we have already said, the want of winter keep compelled farmers to turn their cattle on to the permanent grasses as soon as any vegetation appeared. This has kept down the supply of grass, and, unless there are now copious rains, the bare condition of the pasture fields and the shortness of the hay harvest will make feeding scarce. Copious rains, however, would so change all the conditions as to obviate the necessity for any movement in prices.

MADAME RISTORI ON STAGE SCIENCE.

We have received a kindly letter from Mme. Ristori on the subject treated in our last article on "Stage Science," which was devoted to "make-up." Mme. Ristori says:—"I have always been of the opinion of Mlle. Clairon that the less paint or powder an actor or actress employs the better." It will be remembered that we quoted this famous actress of the eighteenth century, who was so opposed to the use of fards and greases, powders and paints, that she scarcely "made up" at all. Mme. Ristori continues:—"I therefore never employed any means beyond those absolutely necessary to bring out the characteristics of the personage I was representing." Here we must observe that it has been given to few artists to possess the peculiarly regular and beautiful features of Mme. Ristori, which so readily lent themselves to the ideal representation of heroic and historical personages. Her noble face required but little make-up to give us a complete idea of what a Medea or a Myrrha should be. Indeed, few painters would have cared for a finer model; and so mobile was her expression that the least alteration in her head-dress changed her countenance completely into at least an ideal picture of the character she wished to represent. Thus, as she says:—"With regard to Mary Stuart, when I once had on the traditional head-dress, as she died only thirty-four years of age, but little 'make-up' was necessary." This is true; but Mme. Ristori even off the stage, if she but wore "the traditional head-dress," easily recalled the Queen of Scots, her cast of features being identical with those of Mary as represented on her effigy at Westminster—a fact we were astonished to observe when recently comparing a photograph of her profile with one taken from that of the face of the unhappy Queen of Scotland on her tomb in the Abbey. As Elizabeth Mme. Ristori tells us she was obliged to use more art and skill in her "make-up," but she says "I never used anything horribly realistic." We differ with the great tragédienne in her opinion that "even the placing of dark sticking-plaster over the teeth"—which she assures us she never did in her representation of the last hours of the worn-out Queen of England—is in the least degree objectionable, if it is done for the legitimate motive of helping the artist to be like the personage, according to historians and tradition, he or she intends to represent. But it is pleasant to observe that so great an artist as Mme. Ristori condemns all illegitimate tricks, even those of "make-up," as being contrary to the higher purposes of histrionic art. She is an authority if one were needed, and we quote her with all the greater pleasure because we hope she will not be heard in vain. Our actors and actresses have of late years fallen into a pernicious habit of making themselves up altogether too coarsely and too much. The introduction upon the stage of electrical and other strong lights is now so general, that the careless "make-up" of years ago cannot be tolerated, for it destroys all illusion. At the same time the "make-up" of French actors is even more reprehensible than that of our own. The women rouge too much, and blacken their eyes in such a manner that all expression is taken out of them; and the men follow certain traditional rules so slavishly that, instead of presenting individuals, they only succeed in giving us types of character. One young man resembles another, and the old men are all the immediate descendants of the grotesque old gentlemen who probably adorned the stage in the days of Molière. Mme. Ristori, in concluding her interesting letter, says:—"I am sure you will agree with me that a true artist should resist any temptation to be horribly realistic"; and with this we most heartily agree.

RICHTER CONCERTS.

Two novelties have been brought forward in the course of the last fortnight at these concerts—"An Overture to Twelfth Night," by Mr. Mackenzie, and Liszt's "St. Francis of Assisi Preaching to the Birds," transcribed for orchestra by Felix Motl. Dr. Richter's programme on Monday last was too long, and necessitated his leaving hardly any breathing-time between the numbers. Mr. Mackenzie's Overture undoubtedly suffered somewhat by being played immediately after the Introduction to the third act of the Meistersinger. We can happily add, however, that it stood the test admirably. It is, as we had a right to expect from Mr. Mackenzie, brilliantly and ingeniously written. The Introduction, which is of a sober character, at once fixes the attention and leads to the quick movement having reference to the jests and mischief of Sir Toby and his crew; the wood, wind, and strings alternate with bright effect, and the whole movement, which sparkles with high light, forms an effective contrast to the Introduction and the Andante which follows, and which would seem to deal with Olivia's love. Much invention and a genuine comprehension of his subject are revealed by the composer in the working-out, wherein pathos and grotesque humour are excellently mingled; but the final burst of hilarity which brings the work to a close, strikes us on a first hearing as having more noise than merriment, and as lacking spontaneity. In spite of much that is quaint and charming, and of some passages of delicate beauty, we find Liszt's Legend of St. Francis rather disappointing. It betrays no intimate sentiment of bird-life, and the various members of the kindly saint's congregation are suggestive of the aviary rather than of the open wild. All praise is due to Herr Felix Motl for his incomparably skilful and sympathetic orchestration of this work, in which the horn, which appropriately delivers the good warm utterances of St. Francis, takes a prominent and delightful part. We owe a debt of gratitude to Dr. Richter for his large and genial rendering of Haydn's Symphony in C, perhaps the happiest and most delightful of all his creations, of which the beauty and genius have been too often handed over to the mercy of inferior conductors, who drag the tempo, and belittle the whole character of this broad and joyous work by the spirit of finikin vulgar sentimentality in which they approach it. Mr. Henri Marteau's first appearance in England was a decided and well-deserved success, but we wish that we could have heard him in anything else rather than in Max Bruch's wearisome and industrious Concerto in G. He plays with correctness and vigour, although his upper notes might be stronger with advantage. Beethoven's Fourth Symphony, faultlessly rendered, brought last Monday's programme to an end. On May 28th, Liszt's "Todtentanz" was played by Mr. Fritz Hartvigson, to whose incomparable execution we called attention when he performed this difficult music at the London Symphony Concerts. We need only add that he was on the present occasion admirably seconded by the orchestra. Mr. Henschel's singing of Sachs's monologues "Wahn! Wahn!" and "Wie duftet doch der Flieder," from the Meistersinger, was absolutely perfect, especially in the last excerpt, in which his phrasing was little short of miraculous. It seems to us that Dr. Richter was mistaken in bringing forward the later version of the Tannhäuser Overture in the concert-room, for which it is little suited, and where the disastrous vulgarity of the "transparency" music with which it concludes makes itself doubly felt. The programme included Schumann's Genoveva Overture, and Brahms's Second Symphony, which we cannot hear too often.

EXHIBITIONS.

THE main building of the Italian Exhibition, which is at last in perfect order, and is 1,400 feet long, is devoted to a demonstration of what Italy can do in the way of artistic furniture. At no previous exhibition have we ever seen a more remarkable collection of delightful objects for home decoration. It is only, however, so long as the artists depend on purely Italian models that they are wholly satisfactory; for so soon as they imitate the Parisians—and they are very fond of the experiment—they not only lose their originality, but become absolutely vulgar, evidently not possessing that chic which somehow or other saves the art of the Boulevards from becoming detestably common. It is principally, it appears, at Milan, Venice, Vicenza, Bologna, and Florence that the best modern Italian furniture is manufactured, and it is evidently not merely the work of intelligent carpenters, but of well-trained artists, who in many cases deserve to be called great. Of these perhaps the most remarkable are Signori Toso, Besarel, Rossi, Raddi, Borelli, Minghetti, dal Tedesco, Bauer, Guartara, Focà, Zanetti, Galio, and the Moro brothers, who in various parts of the Exhibition display some marvellous specimens of their art. It is a curious fact that scarcely one of these firms was in existence thirty-five years ago—a satisfactory proof of the progress in commercial importance which Italy has made since her unification. Signor Toso, who has an immense stall entirely devoted to carved wood furniture, has selected some of his models with picturesque effect from specimens of the Italian furniture to be found introduced into the pictures of Carpaccio and Botticelli and other early masters. This is an excellent idea, and one which English artists in the same line might follow with advantage. The Italian wood-carvers seem to understand much better than those of any other country that high relief should be carefully finished and sharply cut. Nothing better of its kind could well be than Signor Focà's work, of which there is an extensive exhibit, close to another of equal merit by Signor V. Aimone. Much of the furniture shown, however, seems modelled on the same lines, the models being invariably those of the latter half of the sixteenth and first of the seventeenth centuries. Signor Boggatti, however, has a singularly original kind of furniture copied from ancient Egyptian designs. His little brackets with Moorish arches are very charming. There are some fine exhibits of inlaid furniture, in the various styles peculiar to Italy and India, whence possibly this fanciful kind of decoration originated; and there are also several good specimens of modern Florentine cabinets, encrusted with gems, proving that this highly decorative art is not lost. The Moro brothers have revived the effective art of gilding and silvering leather for upholstery, and some which they show is exquisite, the leather being so finely silvered that it looks as if it were covered with fish-scales. The various kinds of majolica for which Italy has been celebrated for centuries is shown in amazing profusion. The huge vases and plates, admirably painted in the styles of Faenza, Urbino, Pesaro, Florence, and Naples, are not only remarkable for their size, but also for the beauty of their shapes, colouring, glaze, and the finish with which they are painted. Signori Cantagalli, of Florence, have a remarkable collection of reproductions of Urbino ware and of Lucca della Robbia's Madonnas, with their well-known wreaths of leaves and lemons. The Marquis Ginori, among other beautiful specimens of his famous ware, sends two magnificent vases, painted with masterly copies of Raphael's frescoes in the Vatican, the school at Athens, and the battle of Constantine.

No city in Italy was more celebrated for its majolica than Pesaro in the sixteenth century; but its fortunes fell so low later on that even as recently as 1860 there was not a pottery of importance in the town or its neighbourhood. If we may judge from the fine specimens of this industry shown by the two houses of Malaroni and Cai & Co., we may conclude that this interesting and artistic old town is returning to life, and that commercial enterprise is not wholly dead within her walls. This Pesarese pottery is very decorative, the forms excellent, and the painting singularly strong and effective. It is also very cheap. There are two elaborate exhibits of Venetian glass, one by Sir Henry Layard's Venice Murano Company, and the other in the garden belonging to Commendatore Salviati, to whom the art world owes a debt of gratitude for having revived this exquisite art. The bronzes are superlatively fine, some being of colossal size, and the reproductions of ancient jewelry exquisite. In short, so far as the manufactured objects of art are concerned, the Exhibition is surprisingly fine. We shall have to wait a week or so yet before we can form a just opinion of the purely commercial exhibits which are being arranged in an annexe in the garden, which is not yet in order. The said gardens are now quite charming, and the theatre—a big building, painted externally to resemble the palace of the Podesta at Padua—was opened on Thursday with a performance of very amusing burattini or marionettes.

The Irish Exhibition at Olympia is still in a very chaotic condition. The opening ceremony, which took place early in the week, was, however, a very well managed function, and the heterogeneous collection of notabilities who are wont to assemble on these occasions had little cause to complain this time, for they could not only hear, but also even see, the Lord Mayors of London and Dublin, who performed the ceremony. But the Exhibition is still a thing of the future—of the near future, we are persuaded, for the management is pushing on the works vigorously. The Irish Village is not yet tenanted or even entirely built; the Tower of Blarney rises from the centre of a circle of scaffolding, and the band has to play to an accompaniment of almost incessant hammering. Such of the exhibits as are already in place are very fine and interesting, consisting, namely, of lace, damask, linen, and homespun. The so-called Donegal industries are admirably represented, and Mr. Arthur Cole's trophy of all kinds of Irish lace is superb. The gallery will be devoted to collections of Irish art; but there is very little to see there now. It is a pity this Exhibition opened under such disadvantageous circumstances; for it has a formidable rival in its neighbour, the Italian Exhibition, which is now finished and in perfect order.

DRAMATIC RECORD.

HAWTHORNE'S celebrated romance The Scarlet Letter, although distinctly dramatic, is the reverse of theatrical, and hence the failure of all the numerous attempts hitherto made to dramatize it. The characters which are so strongly defined in the story are psychological studies, and therefore become monotonous when they deliver themselves of their interminable monologues before the footlights. Hester Prynne's silent and terrible penance is better left to the descriptive pen of the American novelist than entrusted for stage representation even to so exceptionally interesting an actress as Miss Janet Achurch. Mr. "Alec Nelson" is responsible for the version of The Scarlet Letter produced at the Olympic on Tuesday afternoon. There has been a great deal said in theatrical circles about the propriety of this or that writer dramatizing Hawthorne's story; but into this controversy we, for obvious reasons, prefer not to venture, all the more so as neither of the pieces founded on it and produced this week seem to have much chance of obtaining lasting success. Mr. "Alec Nelson's" play is marked, however, by considerable ability in the choice of episodes and in the selection of what is most striking in the dialogue, which, for the most part, has been taken bodily out of the book, and it could not easily be improved upon. The ending, too, is dramatic, and follows closely the story; so that poetical justice is meted out to the wrongdoer and his unhappy victim. On the other hand, the introduction of the witch, Mistress Hibbins, powerfully played by Miss Dolores Drummond, rather confuses than strengthens the plot, and it would, we think, have been wiser to have eliminated her altogether. Mr. Charrington did not appear to advantage as the Rev. Arthur Dimmesdale until the last scene, which he played with considerable force and pathos. The Hester of Miss Achurch is a careful study, but, although graceful and [illegible], wanting in power and sympathy. Hawthorne's Hester is [illegible] in repentance and dignified in her mode of carrying her penance into effect, and these qualities Miss Achurch failed to display. In the scene with Dimmesdale in the forest she was at her best; but in the last scene, at the pillory, she did not—as indeed, might well be imagined—convey that overwhelming sense of grandeur and desolation which this supreme situation demands.

Mr. Fernandez was excellent as Roger Prynne, and scored a distinct success. Perhaps, however, the best piece of acting of all was the impersonation of the child Pearl by Miss Gracie Muriel. There was an impish diablerie in all she said and did which was in perfect accord with Hawthorne's intention. Miss Lilian Milward, by dint of graceful bearing, a pretty voice and manner, made something more than a sketch of a subordinate but useful part.

An extremely pretty ballet called Antiope has been produced this week at the Alhambra. It is invented by Signor Coppi, and has an intelligible plot. To relate the story, however, would not prove particularly interesting reading, and to describe the beauty of the scenery and the brilliance of the costumes is superfluous. Mlle. Bessone, as Antiope, surpasses herself in grace and boldness, and her last pas seul is so elegant as to quite justify the enthusiasm with which it is received—possibly thus danced Cerito and Elsler in the days when ballet was as indispensable as the orchestra itself to opera.

Miss Sophie Eyre now plays the part of Marita in Mr. Barnes of New York at the Olympic. Her powerful acting has greatly strengthened the interest of this piece, which is generally well acted and well worth seeing—at least by those who enjoy a good melodrama.

Mrs. Bernard Beere, in reviving Masks and Faces at the Opera Comique, has not been altogether successful in her choice of exponents for some of the important parts. As Peg Woffington she herself sustains the varied moods expected of that famous character in the situations in which Charles Reade made her take a leading part. With the same lightness that she formerly displayed she goes through with her impromptu histrionics at Mr. Vane's supper-party when her infatuated lover is confronted by the unexpected presence of his wife; with the same rollicking and impulsive open-heartedness she ministers to the starving Triplet family, and cheers the unrequited playwright with her well-feigned fun; and with the same show of womanly tenderness and self-sacrifice she brings husband and wife together once more. All this and more Mrs. Bernard Beere achieves with sparkling vivacity and humour, under which, however, we miss any deep undercurrent of emotion. Her gestures, as before, are demonstrative, even to being sometimes spasmodic; her voice is not always under control, and is occasionally a trifle grating; but her acting throughout is bold, and often brilliant. We cannot but think that a mistake has been made in giving to M. Marius the part of Sir Charles Pomander, a character essentially that of the Cockney eighteenth-century rake. That M. Marius acts the part with his usual finish and dramatic force no one would deny; but his foreign accent so militates against the true conception of the character that its features seem altogether lost. It is, perhaps, not so much his accent that obtrudes itself as the valiant efforts M. Marius makes to compass our forms of emphasis and pause. We are loth to dwell on this, for M. Marius deserves the position he has gained on the London stage; but it is neither kind to him nor to the audience to put him through this part. Miss Kate Vaughan as Mabel Vane, of course, dominates the grace and feeling department of the play, and Mr. Henry Neville, though hardly an ideal Triplet, is admirable in the portraiture he has adopted as representing his reading of the unfortunate playwright. The remaining characters were neither good nor bad, but within measurable approach of both. The bad clearly falls to the share of the "utility men," but does not take quite so solid a form as such gentry sometimes display, who multiply their utility twice over into itself that they may exhibit it in cubic measure.

There is a vivid description in one of Hawthorne's letters of the violent emotion that overtook the author of The Scarlet Letter as he read aloud the final scene of the romance when just completed. It broke his wife's heart, he says, and gave her a grievous headache. The version of The Scarlet Letter produced on Monday at the Royalty will certainly break no hearts, nor will the sublimity of it, or the pathos, provoke headaches. To say that Messrs. Stephen Coleridge and Norman Forbes have misrepresented Hawthorne's fantastic romance is to say too much in one direction and too little in another. As adaptors they have been literal enough. Their method is, indeed, absolutely mechanical and unimaginative. Their fidelity to the letter is quite as fatal to the play as is their entirely successful elimination of the spirit—the delicate, wayward, incommunicable charm—of Hawthorne's masterpiece. Nor is it easy to conceive that they have spoiled their work in deference to the supposed bias of popular taste in favour of sweet and happy finales. If they had followed Hawthorne in the fifth act, as in the four previous acts, or tableaux—for such they are—and made Arthur Dimmesdale confess and die, the result could scarcely be bettered. There is not, as we have said above, the making of a drama in The Scarlet Letter. Its elements are too ethereal for concrete presentment. Divorced from the remote and rarified atmosphere of their environment, with its metaphysical subtlety and ingenious symbolism, Hester Prynne, Dimmesdale, and Chillingworth no longer breathe. In stage representation there is no possible equivalent to Hawthorne's exquisite literary artistry, and the fascination of The Scarlet Letter is largely due to qualities of execution that defy translation. A psychological process, like Roger Chillingworth's long-drawn torture of the young clergyman, can only be suggested by its reaction in the victim. At the Royalty not the faintest insight into the nature of the physician's experiment, or the slow, agonizing sapping of its action, is afforded by the Chillingworth of Mr. Norman Forbes and the Arthur Dimmesdale of Mr. Forbes-Robertson. Chillingworth is a mere vulgar villain, with a spice of cunning. Dimmesdale is a commonplace cleric, with a bad pulpit delivery and hard, unsympathetic voice. The device by which Hawthorne's dénouement is altered is inconceivably puerile. Chillingworth is introduced to the prison, in the second act, as a physician to minister to Hester Prynne. Here, after the recognition of husband and wife, he takes from her finger the wedding-ring, and henceforth wears it himself. In the last act the authorities of Boston have received secret information that Chillingworth was the cowardly partner of Hester Prynne's guilt, and in the presence of all but Arthur Dimmesdale he is accused and denies all knowledge of her. The ring with its inscription "Hester Prynne" convicts him of lying—and never was lying more superfluously silly—and the mob forthwith lynch him. Arthur Dimmesdale mounts the scaffold, where Hester Prynne has stood throughout the scene, and proceeds to explain the inexplicable to a heedless mob and a bewildered theatre. Whether he is about to confess, or to announce his approaching marriage with Hester Prynne, mortal ingenuity cannot decide. In the first four acts the bare progress of Hawthorne's story—slight as it is—is followed with fair accuracy. In this, the last, we see what it is to attempt to improve Hawthorne. We would not make too much of the attempt, for playwrights, especially when they are also actors, have never been deficient in this sort of daring. Miss Calhoun plays the part of Hester Prynne with no trace of subtlety, though with decided grace and sensibility in the scenes with Pearl. The actress is, however, but ill supported. Mr. Forbes-Robertson is laboured and monotonous. Mr. Norman Forbes is consistently stagey.

RACING.

THE Thursday at the late Manchester meeting was a day of woe to backers, as not a single favourite won, from first to last. Mr. D. Baird's El Dorado, a dark bay colt by Sterling out of Palmflower, who had been second to Donovan in a field of twenty-five for the Portland Stakes at Leicester, was made a strong favourite for the Breeders' Foal Stakes of 1,800*l.* The second favourite was Sir R. Jardine's Fitztraver, by Fitz-James out of Glee, by Adventurer. This colt won the race by three-quarters of a length from the favourite, and Wenonah ran third. Lord Bradford's victory with his three-year-old colt, Merry Andrew, in the Manchester Cup on the Friday, was a most popular one, although it was not propitious to backers, as the colt has been only sixth favourite. Being by Chippendale out of Jubilant, he is inbred to Emilius and Touchstone, having three strains of each blood, within the fifth degree. As a two-year-old he had only won one race out of ten. The betting on the great Whitsuntide Plate of 5,000*l.* for two-year-olds was much influenced by three previous races at the Manchester Meeting, all of which were won by horses belonging to General Owen Williams. It was reported that his colt, L'Avare, had been tried to be much better than either of these winners, so he was made first favourite for the Whitsuntide Plate, and we may dismiss him at once by saying that he was beaten before he had run half the course. There were eleven runners, and from the distance the race lay between the Duke of Portland's Donovan, Mr. C. Perkins's Chitabob, and Lord Gerard's Bryony. Chitabob held the lead, kept it to the end, and won by four lengths from Donovan. Although a stone would not, as a rule, account for a four-lengths' beating, the question asked among students of public form, after the race, was whether Donovan could have won if he had not been giving Chitabob 13 lbs.; for it was argued that Webb had eased him when he found he could not win. Donovan had already won 7,034*l.* in stakes, and it might be that his extra weight now prevented him from making his winnings considerably over 11,000*l.* Chitabob had started first favourite for the Portland Stakes at Leicester, and only finished sixth. This grandly made and very powerful colt is a golden chestnut, with some white markings. Robert the Devil and Jenny Howlet, the St. Leger and Oaks winners of 1880, were his sire and dam.

The racing on the first day at Epsom was of no great interest, with the exception of the Woodcote Stakes, which was contested by some two-year-olds of high price. Mr. Abington's Freemason had cost 1,900 guineas as a yearling, his Isleworth 1,200, and Mr. D. Baird's Roslin 1,050. Mr. Quartermaine East's Kaikoura, the winner of the May Plate at Windsor, with 7 lbs. extra, represented the only winning form, and in the opinion of some good judges she was the best looking of the party. The first favourite was Mr. Rose's colt by Galliard out of Distant Shore. He had never run in public, but it was rumoured that he had done wonders in a trial. Isleworth and Freemason showed temper at the post. Roslin and Arquebus made most of the running almost as far as the distance, where Prince Soltykoff's home-bred colt, Gold, took the lead, followed by the Distant Shore colt. Opposite the centre of the Stand Freemason joined them. There was then a sharp struggle, but Cannon managed to win with Gold by half a length from Freemason, to whom he was giving 3 lbs., while the Distant Shore colt finished three lengths behind them. Gold is a powerful chestnut colt by Sterling out of the Cambridgeshire winner, Lucetta. He has, therefore, three strains of Sir Hercules's blood, with two of Touchstone, and, like so many of the most successful racehorses of the day, one of Blacklock.

The racing on the Wednesday, with the exception of the Derby, was of no special interest, so we need not notice it. We may, however, observe that we were glad to see that Lord Dudley and Mr. Noel Fenwick had dropped their assumed names of "Mr. E. Wardour" and "Mr. Warblington." None of the Derby horses came out for the Epsom Grand Prize on the Thursday, yet it was an interesting and an open race. The field was exactly the same size as that of the Derby itself. The favourite was Mr. Houldsworth's Neapolis, who had run Crowberry to a length, when receiving 13 lbs. at Kempton Park. The second favourite was the Duke of Portland's Johnny Morgan, a colt that puzzled the prophets, because, after running second to his owner's colt Ayrshire for the Two Thousand, he had afterwards run wretchedly for the Manchester Cup, as we have already observed. Mr. Peck's Socrates was third favourite, although his public form scarcely entitled him to that position, and the next in demand was Lord Bradford's Merry Andrew, the winner of the Manchester Cup. It was one thing, however, to meet Johnny Morgan at 20 lbs., and quite another to meet him at even weights. Toscano, who had beaten Merry Andrew by a neck at even weights, at Chester, was now to give him 3 lbs., so it was to be expected that the pair would now be on an exact equality. Johnny Morgan jumped off with the lead when the flag fell, followed by Toscano, Merry Andrew, and Neapolis. At the top of the hill he had increased his lead, and Merry Andrew was his immediate attendant. In descending the hill, Lord Cadogan's Osric, who, it will be remembered, won the Queen's Plate at Lincoln, raced up to Johnny Morgan's girths. The Duke of Portland's colt seemed put out of humour by this challenge; for, on reaching Tattenham Corner, he tried to bolt, and the pair ran slightly out of their line. Rickaby seized this opportunity of getting to the front with Merry Andrew, and he came over the road with the lead. From this point Johnny Morgan gave up all attempts at racing, and as Merry Andrew came up the straight, Mr. Craven's Scene Shifter appeared to be the only horse he had to fear. Neapolis was now rolling about like a beaten horse, and Warne was hard at work upon him below the distance; but, on reaching the stands, he began to respond in a very generous manner to the whip and to make up ground at a surprising pace. He soon passed Scene Shifter, as if that colt were standing still, and then he raced up to Merry Andrew until the pair were almost neck and neck. It was a beautiful race. Neapolis seemed to have the race in hand almost at the last stride, when he hung a little, and got beaten by a head. This, of course, was a great reversal of Merry Andrew's Chester form with Toscano, as the latter was now only seventh. Johnny Morgan's running, again, was strangely inconsistent with his form in the Two Thousand. His displays of temper, however, made his Manchester Cup and Grand Prize performances of no value as a basis of calculation with regard to either the past or the future. They will probably have the effect of making backers afraid of trusting him. He is just the sort of horse that may come out some day and win an important race when least expected and least wanted. In shape, bone, and quality he was at least as attractive as anything in the race, although exception was taken to his hocks. By winning the Manchester Cup and the Epsom Grand Prize, Merry Andrew landed very nearly 5,000*l.* in stakes for Lord Bradford. This spring he had been underrated by about 23 lbs., for he was put into the Free Handicap at 6 st. 12 lbs., and his victory in the Grand Prize raised him to 8 st. 7 lbs. In winning the Manchester Cup by a neck under only 6 st. 1 lb., and the Epsom Grand Prize by a head, he was perhaps a trifle lucky. His Epsom running does not put him within a good many pounds of the best of his year, as he only gave Neapolis 7 lbs. and a bare beating, whereas Crowberry gave Neapolis 13 lbs. and beat him by a length. Yet some pounds may be allowed for a colt's performance in his first race, and Neapolis did not look nearly so fit when he ran for the first time at Kempton, on the 11th of May, as he did at Epsom on the 31st; so it is possible that Merry Andrew's form in the Grand Prize may be better in reality than it would appear at first sight. Moreover, there is this to be said in his favour—that he won, within a week, two important races over courses of different distances and characters.

Backers were much divided in opinion as to whether Lord Calthorpe's chestnut filly, Seabreeze, or Mr. D. Baird's brown filly, Briar Root, had the best chance of winning the Oaks. The two-year-old form of the former, who won 4,122*l.*, had been, on the whole, far better than that of the latter, who won 4,725*l.*, and Seabreeze was the most admired of the pair. Each of them had beaten the winner of the Derby, so no one could fairly cavil at the field for the Oaks on the score of quality. This season Briar-root had beaten Seabreeze by two lengths for the One Thousand; but Seabreeze's admirers maintained that she had not been herself on that occasion, and that, since she was a better stayer than her opponent, she would be more suited to the Oaks course than to the Rowley mile; moreover, they declared that even at Newmarket she had been gaining rapidly on Briar Root as they came up the hill to the winning-post. Mr. C. Perkins's Belle Mahone, a bay filly by Uncas out of Jenny Howlet, had been a length behind Seabreeze for the One Thousand. Then there was Baron de Rothschild's Her Majesty, a bay filly by Robert the Devil out of Peace. As a two-year-old she won the Woodcote Stakes, a performance which looked as if the Epsom course suited her, and she also won the Prendergast Stakes at Newmarket; but this year she had been unplaced for both the One Thousand and the French Oaks. A hundred-pound Maiden Plate was the only race that had hitherto been placed to the credit of Lord Cholmondeley's chestnut filly, Polydor, by Bend Or. The best that could be said of the form of Lord Falmouth's bay filly, Rada, was that she had once beaten the notorious Fullerton, at an advantage in the weights, and that she had been placed for all her other races. Although well shaped, she is a mere pony in size. There were only these half-dozen starters, and they got off on the second attempt. With Briar Root in the van, the little field ran in a cluster up the hill, and it was not broken until Polydor fell into the rear on going down the incline towards Tattenham Corner. As they came round the turn, Seabreeze and Rada went up to Briar Root, who had thus far held a slight lead through the greater part of the race, and the trio crossed the road in line, with Belle Mahone and Her Majesty immediately behind them. From this point Robinson gradually took a lead with Seabreeze, followed by Rada. At the distance Seabreeze came away by herself, while Briar Root gave up the struggle. Opposite the stand Belle Mahone made her effort, but without even overhauling little Rada. In the meantime Seabreeze was holding her own, and she won easily by a couple of lengths. This, of course, was an upset of the One Thousand form; but, if it be admitted that Briar Root is a non-stayer, the apparent contradiction is satisfactorily accounted for. Indeed, it may seem fair enough that each of these two smart fillies should have divided the principal mares' races of the year between them, the speediest winning on the shorter and the better stayer on the longer course. At the same time one cannot help asking oneself the question why, if Briar Root is known to be a non-stayer, her jockey should have made the running with her? Seabreeze, who is a splendid filly, is inbred to Birdcatcher and Touchstone, having two strains of the former and one of the latter blood on her sire's side, and two of the latter and one of the former on her dam's. She also has that one strain of Blacklock which, as we said above, is now so fashionable. With regard to the rest of the racing, we have only space to observe that the twelve-year-old Laceman won the Walton Stakes for Lord Cholmondeley. This extraordinary old gelding has run in something like eighty-five races, of which he has won the decent proportion of about twenty-five. Let it not any longer be said that no modern race-horse "trains on"!

REVIEWS.

GREEK THE LANGUAGE OF CHRIST AND HIS APOSTLES.*

After patiently going through the elaborate demonstration of Dr. Roberts we are inclined to invert a famous saying, and declare that although his judgment is not good, his reasons for it are excellent. The value of this conscientious piece of work, which every biblical scholar will read with some gain and much delight, lies in its processes rather than in the conclusion to which the author hopes they will lead us. Dr. Roberts is not the first advocate who has marshalled rich stores of learning and argument on behalf of a cause which remains at the end not proved. He pathetically tells us, as he bespeaks attention to his arguments, that it has been "the one great literary labour of his life" to establish the hypothesis that Greek was the habitual language used by our Lord in His public teaching. More than a quarter of a century has passed since he first wrote upon the subject, but "up to this time his endeavours have only been very partially successful." He now tells us that the present volume is his "final effort to convince the world."

He has placed upon his title-page the daring prediction of Jesus Christ, "Heaven and earth shall pass away, but My words shall not pass away." His book is an exhaustive attempt to prove that "My words" in this passage do not refer only to the kernel and substance, but may be applied to the very husk and form in which the Lord's sayings have come to us; so that in reading the Sermon on the Mount or one of the Parables in the Greek Testament we now actually "hear Him," and possess the very sentences and syllables which once fell from His lips. It cannot be denied that we have here the elements of a revolution of a startling character in textual criticism, as conservative in one aspect as it is revolutionary in another. When the acute Quaker Hebraist, Samuel Fisher, was arguing with the Independent persecutor of the Quakers, Dr. John Owen, he forced the latter scholar to concede that the infallibility of the Scripture text was a thing of degrees. St. Paul, for instance, as the original author of an Epistle in the Canon, was divinely inspired, and guarded by the Holy Spirit from committing the least error; the writers at St. Paul's dictation may have been also divinely prevented from mistakes; the transcribers of copies were not inspired; the translators of these copies into Latin, English, or any other tongue were still less inspired. All the Puritan sects—Presbyterian, Independent, and Baptist—realized that the conflict against the Quakers on behalf of the infallibility of the letter was a battle for life or death, since every one of them was built exclusively upon the mere text of the Bible. But it never occurred to either of their respective champions—Owen, Baxter, or Tombes, who each joined in the controversy with Fisher—to assert that in the Greek Gospels they were in the possession of the very words spoken by the Lord. The hypothesis of the Neapolitan Diodati, which Dr. Roberts has indeed modified in one direction, but which he has wonderfully amplified in others, did not occur to any scholar, Jew or Christian, during the controversies of the seventeenth century whether the ever-living Saviour and Teacher, or the written and printed Bible, is properly "the Word of God." They never dreamed that they had more than a translation into Greek of the words which the founder of the Church spoke in Aramaic. It need not be said that Dr. Roberts still has against him both historical tradition and the belief of all scholars save a handful. In this most interesting book, which is crowded with extra-biblical and biblical evidence of the wide prevalence of Greek as a vernacular language amongst all those to whom the Lord and His Apostles spoke, Dr. Roberts appeals "to the reader." It is hardly an appeal, like Fox's and Fisher's, to the reader against the scholar, for it is impossible for any but the scholar to accompany him throughout the process of his argument.

We are surprised that so zealous an inquirer as the author, whose eyes seem to be kept open to almost everything that can affect his "one great literary labour," should have ignored Professor E. Kautzsch, of Tübingen, whose name and works as an Aramaic scholar can scarcely be unknown to him. Kautzsch's unique Grammatik des Biblisch-Aramäischen, with its critical discussion of all the Aramaic words occurring in the New Testament, appeared four years ago, and it has been so widely reviewed in theological literature that we at once looked for some reference to it. The "West-Aramaic" dialect spread by degrees over Palestine until it had totally abolished the use of Hebrew as a speaking language; but for some time the two languages were in use contemporaneously, in much the same degree as Dr. Roberts holds Greek and Aramaic to have been in our Lord's time. The great Aramaic scholar holds that the supplanting of Hebrew by Aramaic was not effected until the end of the third century B.C. The "Zweisprachigkeit" which prevailed in speech and intercourse under the Ptolemies and the Seleucidæ, however, was not between Greek and Aramaic, but between Greek and Hebrew. Hebrew became the language of scholarship and of worship; and Kautzsch affirms that in our Lord's time there must have been some even amongst the masses ("selbst von dem Volke") who still had an intelligent appreciation of the Hebrew. When Dr. Roberts comments upon St. Luke iv. 17, &c., we naturally expect to find him express his agreement with Ewald, De Wette, Bleek, and others, and his disagreement with Keim. It is a strong point with him that "a scholar of the calibre of Keim" should stand almost alone; and he says that "it would be a great satisfaction if those writers who differ from the views which I hold as to the prevalence of Greek in Palestine at the time of Christ would boldly take their stand with Keim, and maintain that the Jews still read the Old Testament in the ancient Hebrew text." He couples, indeed, with Keim, with a note of admiration, a writer in the Church Quarterly Review, April 1887. Well, here was the greatest of living authorities upon the contemporary language of Palestine already taking his stand with Keim in 1884, four years before the publication of the author's appeal! Certainly St. Luke's Gospel does not contain the slightest hint that an interpreter was present to turn into Aramaic the words which Jesus read. Dr. Roberts can only account for it upon the hypothesis, which still remains only hypothesis, that our Lord did not read the Hebrew, but took His text from the Septuagint, and gave His commentary upon it in Greek. Kautzsch has not any doubt that "das Verständniss des Hebräischen," outside scholarly circles, continued after the final "Siege des Aramäischen als Umgangssprache." Dr. Roberts seems to us merely to have denied, and nowise to have refuted, the old powerful arguments, which Kautzsch reproduces as impregnable, from the significance of Hebrew as the one holy language for the whole people, and from the uniform Jewish tradition of the use of Hebrew in public worship. Oral interpretation into Aramaic was permitted, and the natural conclusion is that our Lord read from the sacred roll in Hebrew, and preached upon what He read in Aramaic. Franz Delitzsch declares that Hebrew was not only the language of the Temple worship and of the prayers in the synagogue, but even of family worship, and of all the numerous forms of benediction. We know not how much faith may be put in the assertions of the old Scotch traveller, Lithgow, but according to him there was some survival of Hebrew, as a vernacular language, in the early part of the seventeenth century. Writing of the Jews in Salonica (1610), he said, "They speak vulgarly and maternally the Hebrew tongue, man, woman, and child, and not elsewhere in the whole world."

Dr. Roberts is, of course, obliged to meet the important question as to the language in which St. Matthew's Gospel was originally written. We agree with him rather than with his critics when he contends that it was not in the Aramaic dialect. The Aramaic dialect was one thing; but ἡ ἑβραῒς διάλεκτος, in which St. Paul purposely spoke to the Jews in the holy city, was quite another. We disagree with Dr. Roberts when he contends that, if the original of St. Matthew's Gospel was not written in Aramaic it must have been written in Greek. The solution of the question is curtly stated in the title common to four of his Chapters—X., XI., XII., and XIII.—"Greek the original language of St. Matthew's Gospel." The tenth chapter deals with the "internal evidence," where he lays much stress upon the explanations of Hebrew words and phrases occurring in it; the eleventh treats of the external evidence; the twelfth with the varied statements of the Fathers, particularly the "error," as he is obliged to call it, "of Papias." He even names it a πρῶτον ψεῦδος. It is curious that Papias uses exactly the same expression as the writer of the Acts of the Apostles, and says that St. Matthew's book was written ἑβραΐδι διαλέκτῳ; that is to say, it was not in Aramaic, the vulgar speech, but was, as we should expect such a book for such a purpose to be, in the holy language. The manner in which Dr. Roberts gets rid of "the weak and gossiping Papias" as a witness seems to us too characteristic of the advocate with a brief. Franz Delitzsch says that he was once urged by some of his friends "to translate the New Testament into the Aramaic idiom which was spoken by Christ and His Apostles." He replied that the request was grounded upon an illusion. He told them that Hebrew, and not Aramaic, continued after the exile to be "the literary language of the Jews," and reminded them that the Ecclesiasticus of our Apocrypha was undoubtedly written originally in Hebrew. We observe that Dr. Roberts, who rarely misses any important point, has noticed this in an early part of his book. But he provides a truly characteristic explanation of it. "For several reasons," says he, "I assign to the word ἑβραϊστί, employed by the translator, the same meaning which it bears in the New Testament, and believe the work to have been written in Aramaic." He distinguishes Hebrew and Aramaic as "ancient" and "modern Hebrew." Franz Delitzsch believes that Our Lord and His Apostles both thought and spoke for the most part in Hebrew. Kautzsch questions the latter.

Dr. Roberts has established the truth of the bilingual character of Jewish conversation and intercourse in the time of Christ with a fulness and completeness of evidence hitherto unexampled in English biblical literature. This it is, we venture to think, which will give a permanent value to his noble, arduous, and conscientious labours. He will not thank us, however, for this degree of acknowledgment. He plainly shows us that unless we can accept his conclusion, he can take no satisfaction in our acceptance of the greater part of his evidence. There is something naïve in the contrast between the singular modesty of his manner in the statement of his reasons and the extraordinary self-assertion with which he then demands our adoption of the judgment to which these reasons finally lead him, but do not lead us.

NOVELS AND STORIES.*

THERE is a good deal in a title. Could there be a much less attractive title than Plain Tales from the Hills? Residents in British India and subscribers to the Civil and Military Gazette may know what it means, and hasten to get hold of the book accordingly; but to the untravelled inhabitants of London and the United Kingdom generally it would seem almost as hopeful to undertake the perusal of a volume entitled "Straight Talks from Beulah." We should suggest to Mr. Kipling to change the name of his book to "The Other Man; and other Stories," not because "The Other Man" is his best plain tale, which it is not, but because it would look well on the bookstalls. There are forty plain tales, of which twenty-eight have appeared separately in a newspaper, and the other twelve are, in the modest words of the author, "more or less new." Each tale is extremely short, the average length being just under seven pages. Nevertheless, for the profitable disposal of odds and ends of time or for a cross-country journey in stopping trains on Sunday it would be hard to find better reading. Mr. Kipling knows and appreciates the English in India, and is a born story-teller and a man of humour into the bargain. He is also singularly versatile, and equally at home in humour and pathos; while neither quality is ever quite absent from his little stories. "Thrown Away," a story of a commonplace youth who killed himself in despair merely for want of proper training, is little short of genuine tragedy, and is full of a grim humour which is decidedly telling. "The Three Musketeers" and "A Friend's Friend" are farce of a high order. Four of the stories—and four of the best—concern the British private in regiments stationed in India. An inimitable Irishman appears in each of them, and relates his experiences with a delightful freshness and good humour. The following extract occurs in an astonishing story of the taking of a town inhabited by Burmese Dacoits. The British detachment could not discover where the Dacoits abode; but "Evenshually we puckarowed wan man. 'Trate him tinderly,' sez the Lift'nint. So I tuk him away into the jungle, wid the Burmese Interprut'r an' my clanin'-rod. Sez I to the man:—'My paceful squireen,' sez I, 'you shquot on your hunkers an' dimonstrate to my frind here, where your frinds are whan they're at home?' Wid that

It has been explained just before that "'Tis only a dah and a Snider that makes a dacoit. Widout thim he's a paceful cultivator, an' felony for to shoot." Another remarkable military story is "The Madness of Private Ortheris." Ortheris goes out shooting with his friend Mulvaney and the narrator. They shoot "four pariah-dogs, four green parrots sitting, one kite by the burning-ghaut, one snake flying, one mud-turtle, and eight crows." Then they lunch and drink beer, and after lunch, Private Ortheris, instead of getting drunk, is seized with an insane and unaccountable attack of home-sickness. He delivers a monologue upon the wretched lot of a private soldier in India:—"I'm Tommy—a bloomin', eight-anna, dog-stealin' Tommy, with a number instead of a decent name." He compares his present woes to the delights of London with an earnestness which ought to command the deepest sympathy of those who are fortunate enough to stay at home. "No bloomin' guard-mountin', no bloomin' rotten-stone, nor khaki, an' yourself your own master, an' a gal to take and see the Humaners practisin' a hookin' dead corpses out of the Serpentine o' Sundays. An' I lef' all that for to serve the Widder beyond the seas, where there ain't no women, and there ain't no liquor worth 'avin', an' there ain't nothin' to see, nor do, nor say, nor feel, nor think. Lord love you, Stanley Orth'ris, but you're a bigger bloomin' fool than the rest of the reg'ment hand Mulvaney wired together! There's the Widder sittin' at 'Ome with a gold crown'd on 'er 'ead; an 'ere am Hi, Stanley Orth'ris, the Widder's property, a rottin' FOOL." These ravings, and what follows, give the greatest concern to Ortheris's companions and to the reader, but the affliction passes off, and we are glad to find Ortheris in his right mind and in the highest spirits, three months later, in the story called "The Three Musketeers." The military stories happen to have been dwelt on here, but there are many tales of civilians, and indeed of natives, that are really quite as good. The reader should not omit to peruse the head-notes of the stories, especially when they are in verse. It seems probable that a considerable proportion are Mr. Kipling's own. One advantage in the extreme shortness of the stories is that, as they are read in a few minutes, their incidents are easily forgotten, and they may be read again with fresh pleasure after a short interval. For this reason, and because it is small, the book is one to buy, and not merely to get from the library.

In Sylvia Arden Mr. Oswald Crawfurd has performed a rather ingenious feat. He brings two large and strong men on the scene, and makes it clear that one of them is an atrocious villain, and the other the ingenuous victim of his wiles. No unfair means of deceit are used, and yet it is extremely difficult for novel-readers of the widest experience to make up their minds which is which. The story is put into the mouth of a visitor to Scarfell Chase, a desolate patch of land by the sea-side, some ten miles by two, which art and nature have combined to render practically inaccessible to any one except the guests of the owner, Mr. Gregory Morson (one of the big men). It is supposed that this country—of which there is a map by way of frontispiece—contains or did contain gold, and on the command of this gold the evolution of the plot depends. It is a tremendous plot, and is worked out with much skill. Attempted murders (5), excusable homicides (2), and premature interment (1), lend all their charms to the vivacious story, which easily carries the reader through the volume at a single sitting, unless something much more serious than the arrival of say 2.30 A.M. happens to interrupt it. The weak point of the story is the young lady, who is very attractive to the autobiographical hero, but quite uninteresting to the reader. However, that does not matter much, as there is enough without her to be completely engrossing. There is also a little disappointment in the rather shabby destruction of the subsidiary villain, who is really a fiend in human shape, such as one does not often meet with. He is a man of science, which of course affords opportunities, and Mr. Crawfurd makes the most of them. Taken altogether, Sylvia Arden is a capital story, which no reasonable person will leave unfinished or regret having read.

Miss Helen Rivette was a sort of miracle of beauty, intelligence, and virtue. This statement is made on the authority of Mr. Cyril Bennett, her historiographer. That part of the world in which she moved appreciated her inadequately, and the reader of Mr. Bennett's novel is more inclined to sympathize with Miss Rivette's world than with Mr. Bennett. The Rivette household consisted mainly of Miss Helen and of her mamma, who appreciated her less than anybody. They lived in a villa a little way out of Naples, and jogged along with an indifferent degree of comfort until one day Helen saw a cloud rising over St. Angelo. From that moment her affairs went from bad to worse. Almost immediately lightning came out of the cloud and slew Mr. Rivette, her father, thereby depriving the reader of the honour of his acquaintance. The news was brought to his widow and daughters by one Pierson, between whom and Helen a decorous amour promptly sprang up, and presently blossomed into a matrimonial engagement. This Pierson was a sort of [illegible] relation of Tito Melema, and he and his proceedings are much the best things in the book. The engagement was not, and it was obvious from the first that it could not come to good, and at the end of the second (and last) volume Helen paid the penalty of her want of cynicism. The scene of the story is transferred at an early stage of its development to England, where we are introduced to a high-born and fastidious baronet, his weak-minded maiden sister, a strong-minded schoolmistress, and so on. Also a completely fresh romance about a worthy doctor, with a nice but exceedingly young daughter, and a suitable lover for the latter, is annexed by the slenderest of threads to the woes of Helen Rivette. Could any land-agent have seriously wanted to marry immediately a little girl who wore her hair down her back, and would have looked forward to at least another year in the schoolroom if there had been such a thing on the doctor's premises? Howard Daly did, and he got his way—as far as an engagement went—surprisingly soon. His story and that of Madie (with her hair down) is in no degree different from those of other commonplace heroes and heroines.

There is a certain sort of novel about the only daughter of an amiable but self-indulgent father given to gambling. It runs on narrow lines, and is always dull. Such a story is Philippa Fairfax, and it is therefore quite unworthy of Mrs. Hodgson Burnett. The father has to die, either by suicide or of consumption. Mr. Fairfax adopts the latter course, and Philippa is left desolate until her young man surmounts the fictitious misunderstanding between himself and her, and marries her according to the rule. There is really nothing in the little story more novel and exciting than the circumstance that when Philippa and her lover Wilfred went courting in a boat they were observed, "Phil sitting at the prow, in her light dress, and Wilfred bending to his oars." Wilfred was a particularly abject and odious youth, but that is no reason why he should be such a jackass as to put his lady-love behind him. Besides, the boat must have been down by the head. Mrs. Hodgson Burnett can notoriously do so very much better than this that her condescension is to be regretted.

Dolly Loraine is really the story of Humphrey Armstrong. As they married each other the misnomer is of little consequence. She was a vulgar and not particularly attractive young woman; but he was a blameless prig, and deserved no better. The plot turns on the authorship of an anonymous novel, which is rather ingeniously concealed. There are two drawbacks to it; first, that everything, except some irrelevant foolishness about the prig turning out to be the long-lost heir to a peerage and a fortune, is satisfactorily worked out quite early in the second volume, so that the residue drags. Secondly, that the villain of the story is a young lady whom the unreflecting reader is apt at the beginning to suppose to be the heroine. Her manners are much better than those of Dolly, the real heroine, and her discomfiture at the hands of the latter jars uncomfortably. All this is bad art. Novelists should not finesse. The reader ought, without any effort on his part, to dislike the villains, and take a sympathetic interest in the heroes, from the moment of their introduction. It is disagreeable to find that one has misplaced one's sympathies. The art of fiction consists in effecting a commonplace thing—namely, the triumph of virtue and the confusion of the wicked, in a fresh and pleasing manner. Only good novelists can do this; but anybody can produce an effect by rounding on his own creations. If Miss Morley will bear this general truth in mind there is no reason why she should not write a good story some day. She should also beware of making her subsidiary villains irresistibly suggestive of well-known living personages.

Crane Court is entirely free from the faults of Dolly Loraine, and if less ingenious in plot, is quite equal to it as a piece of reasonably well-written English. It is a simple, pleasing tale, and the people are agreeable to read about. It consists mainly of an account of the mutual love affairs of a thoroughly amiable country gentleman and three of his neighbours, two of them being also tenants of his mansion-house, which falling rents had compelled him to let. He is a widower, with one little boy; and the child and his relations with his father are very nicely done. There are some heart-burnings in various quarters, but they all come right. The heroine, Madeline Delmar, makes up to her impoverished landlord by means of a great friendship with his son. She always addresses him as "My little man," and as he was eight years old it is difficult to believe that he would have stood it. Her brother Owen is represented as a terrible Radical, and, incongruously, as a very good fellow. But these are small blots. It is a pretty story, nicely told.

It is hardly long enough since the publication of Vice Versâ to justify the writing of Francis and Frances. The idea is that there are twins, who live in turns for a day each. Twenty-four hours after their birth one disappeared, and twenty-four hours later that one reappeared and the other disappeared, and they repeated the manœuvre with exact punctuality every afternoon for twenty years, complications naturally ensuing. One was a boy and the other a girl, and their mother, being much distressed by their eccentric behaviour, endeavoured, with a surprising degree of success, to conceal it, and called them Francis and Frances so as not to be detected in speaking of either to persons acquainted only with the other. At the end of twenty years, though Frances duly appeared, Francis did not disappear, and this happened just at a moment when it would have been most inconvenient if he had. Before that the one had always come just where the other had left off; but this time Frances appeared in her mother's drawing-room though her brother was at some distance. Oddly enough, they had grown as fast as if they had both been in the flesh all along, and were not ten, but twenty. The book is very dull and very ill written. Magic should be either awesome, like Undine, or burlesque, like the [illegible] Bultitude; but Francis and Frances is merely prosaic. Under such conditions the human mind refuses to take an interest in what could not happen. If the idea had been reasonably fresh, it would have done credit to the anonymous author. In that case the execution would have been altogether unworthy of it.

There is very little to say about The Web of Fate. The name is not inappropriate, and would do as well for five novels out of six as for this one. There is bigamy in it, and burglary, and murder, and manslaughter, and suicide, and marriage, and love, and jealousy, and a vastly successful detective. There is an impecunious father of a virtuous daughter who marries the hero. Two villains, male and female, plot against the happiness of the hero and heroine, and duly come to grief. Perhaps the merit of the story is the greatness of the grief to which Marcia, the she-villain, comes, in just retribution for her abominable conduct. The novel is written, not especially badly, and by no means especially well. There are some villagers who discourse at an alehouse from time to time in such a way as faintly to suggest Silas Marner—a suggestion which Mr. Wilding would have done well to avoid.

THE PRIMA DONNA.*

As readers are doubtless aware, publishers are obliged to send a copy of every new book that is issued to the British Museum; and the manner in which the heaps and piles of volumes daily increase is really alarming. One wondeis where, a few years hence, storage room will be found for all the books that are turned out; and certainly it is a heavy responsibility to add to the number. But, supposing that a Committee of Taste considered the question of what works should be added to the national store, and rejected those that were unworthy of the distinction, such as the republication in book form of matter which had already appeared and did not deserve to be reprinted; poems to which the Horatian advice "Nonumque prematur in annum" has not been applied; writings in general which are issued at the author's expense, and books which are mainly made up of books already in existence? Instead of a daily waggon-load, a small spring-cart would be amply sufficient to bear the burden to Great Russell Street. Our Committee of Taste would scarcely have rejected Mr. Sutherland Edwards's Prima Donna, but we think it would have requested him to reduce his two volumes to one. Few men are better qualified to write about the wayward and fascinating product of comparatively modern art whose history is here treated; for Mr. Sutherland Edwards, having strong musical sympathies and appreciation, has devoted much time and attention to the subject, and, though we have certain faults to find with him which will be presently stated, we must admit he writes in a remarkably easy and pleasant style, which makes his sketches attractive; but the Committee would point out that a considerable proportion of The Prima Donna had already appeared in various forms, and it would draw special attention to a work in two volumes, called Queens of Song, which was published a few years ago by Messrs. Smith, Elder, & Co., and goes over a great deal of the ground which Mr. Edwards now retreads. We think we know pretty nearly all that is to be known about Catalani, Pasta, Sontag, Malibran, Sophie Arnould, Mara, Jenny Lind—to use the old name—and other well-known singers; and we do not find that Mr. Edwards tells us anything new about them—we doubt, indeed, whether there is anything new to be told. The public history of these artists and at least as much of their private history as concerns the world have been related at considerable length in many places, and it is a little bold of our author to tell the old tales again.

Mr. Edwards is more interesting when he speaks of singers from personal knowledge of them, for then we come to something that is new. Of Mario and Grisi a great deal has been written, but the author has been able to procure details from Mrs. Godfrey Pearce, Mario's daughter, and from Mr. Willert Beale, an intimate friend of the family. Mr. Beale takes us to Mulgrave House, Fulham, which Mario occupied for a time, and gives a very pleasant picture of the place and its occupants. Mario is not yet down to breakfast, though it is past midday, but Donna Giulia, with an unbecoming garden hat on her head—"but I am very certain," Mr. Beale says, "that you will never forget those laughter-loving eyes that beam on you from under the far-reaching brim of the ugly hat—at least if you do, you are less impressionable than any of your fellow-creatures who have ever had the honour of speaking to Giulia Grisi"—is watching her children at play on the lawn around her, and—prosaic occupation for Valentina!—checking the little red account books of the local tradesmen.

> "'Raoul' at length comes on to the lawn, of course smoking a cigar. I never knew him without one, and have seen him take a sponge bath with a lighted cigar in his mouth, while holding an enormous sponge with both hands over his head. There never was a more inveterate smoker. It did not matter what he had to smoke so long as it had any claim to be called tobacco. Not that he was indifferent to the quality of his cigars; on the contrary, he always bought the very best to be obtained, but would put up with any kind rather than be deprived of his favourite luxury.
> "'How do you do? Will you smoke?' he slowly exclaims, saluting us courteously and offering us his cigar-case, in very broken English, which he will continue to try and speak, out of compliment to you, unless you happen to be proficient in French or Italian.
> "He is most plainly dressed, as I have already teld you he would be—a slouch hat, loose shirt and necktie, shooting jacket and trousers completing his attire. He is, nevertheless, one of the most picturesque figures you ever saw; his skin tawny with the sun, long dark eyelashes, thin, black, pointed beard, and exceptionally handsome features forming an ensemble as effective as any painter could dream of for a subject. He invites us to stay to lunch, and the invitation is repeated by Donna Giulia, but as your seem to think we have already exceeded the limits of a morning call, we decline, and assure them we must return to town."

We do not remember having heard of Mario's strong superstition as to the evil influences of Friday and of the number 13. Sir Julius Benedict relates an anecdote on this head. One Thursday night, the 12th of the month, Mario was engaged to sing at a house in Belgrave Square, and that house No. 13. Knowing his fancies on the subject, Sir Julius concealed the fact that the number was that which Mario regarded as fatal to his peace; but when they drove up to the door he noted the dreadful figure—and at that moment the clock struck twelve; it was Friday. The combination was so alarming that, in spite of all his friend's arguments and representations, Mario insisted on being driven straight home.

Mr. Edwards's experience of the opera seems to have extended over some forty years, during which time he has heard all that has been best worth hearing; but he most certainly has not turned his knowledge and recollections to the best account. One thing that he should have done was to tell us the parts in which, in his opinion, the prime donne he introduces were most successful, and by what special qualities and characteristics the success was achieved. Instead of this, in chapters headed by the names of various great singers, we find a good deal of what is suspiciously like padding, and certainly much matter which is not legitimately introduced. Thus more than three-fourths of the chapter professedly on "Bosio" is not about Bosio at all, but contains a long description of Glinka's opera, Life for the Tzar, which was produced at Covent Garden last season. Bosio did not even sing in this opera, and Mr. Edwards drags in his account by the neck with the clumsy preface, "As interesting, in a different way, though less fascinating than the singing of Angiolina Bosio, was the performance, during the coronation festivities, of the national Russian opera by Glinka." Quite so; but all this—there are more than eight pages of it, and less than four about the prima donna—has not the remotest connexion with Bosio. The "Titiens" chapter, which treats the lamented singer very inadequately, is spun out by reference to the Ring des Nibelungen, no note of which she can ever have heard. The "Albani" chapter, again, includes an essay on Wagnerism; we are told how Mendelssohn and Meyerbeer were the select objects of Wagner's satire and invective; and once more that all too familiar anecdote of Wagner ostentatiously putting on a pair of white gloves before conducting one of Mendelssohn's symphonies at a Philharmonic concert is pressed into service. This is not playing the game. What we naturally look for, and do not find, are detailed descriptions of Mlle. Titiens as, say, the Leonora of Fidelio and the Valentina of Les Huguenots; of Mme. Nilsson as Margherita in the operas of Gounod and Boito; of Mme. Patti as Rosina and Dinorah; and it would have been instructive if an account had been added of what was lacking in her Valentina and in some of the other "dramatic soprano" parts in which deficiencies have been observable. Mme. Lucca, again, might have been described in the characters of Cherubino and Selika. Mr. Edwards does nothing to bring before our imaginations the personages of whom he writes. That Mme. Nilsson brought into unusual prominence the part of Elvira in Don Giovanni the author does note, but he should have told us by what means this was done; and we may passingly differ from his opinion that "the lamentations of this ill-used lady are not, as a rule, thought to form the most interesting part of Mozart's opera." Surely Donna Elvira has to sing some of the most charming music in the score? There are other omissions which render the book very incomplete. The name of Mme. Sembrich is not once mentioned, yet she certainly made her mark. Mme. Neveda's name occurs once, incidentally, in a quotation from an American newspaper. The existence of Mme. Scalchi is ignored, though a word might well have been said about her. Mme. Trebelli, we are glad to see, is not neglected. The book deals exclusively with prime donne who have been heard in England.

It is perhaps natural that the longest chapter should be devoted to Mme. Patti. Her first meeting with Mme. Lucca is amusingly described, though, by the way, as Mr. Edwards remarks several times in his book that Mmes. Patti, Nilsson, and Lucca were all born in the same year, 1843, the observation that in 1859 "Mme. Lucca was about the same age as her rival" is scarcely needed.

> On arriving at Berlin Mdlle. Patti, as a stranger and as the last comer, hastened to pay Mdlle. Lucca a visit. Mdlle. Lucca lived at this time on a fourth floor (though the loftiness of one's abode has not so much significance in Continental capitals as in London), and she received her visitors—Maurice Strakosch and his sister-in-law—not only in her bed-room, but in bed. "Between the sheets," writes Strakosch, "she looked like a child; and with her first words she expressed her astonishment at seeing Adelina Patti, who, like herself, was a delicate and adorable little creature. 'What!' repeated Lucca, as if in spite of herself, 'are you the great Patti?' No rivalry existed between the two singers except on the stage. Away from the theatre they remained on the most friendly terms. In spite of the press, which showed itself hostile, Adelina Patti triumphed with the public; and King William, who was not yet Emperor, attended all her performances, and went to congratulate her in her box."

At this time Mme. Patti was receiving 1,000 francs a night (and Mme. Lucca only 1,000 francs a month); since then 1,000*l.* a performance has been given for her services, and her terms are so high that no impresario can by any possibility pay them. Yet, as Mr. Edwards points out in one of the very few passages of criticism which he writes, Mme. Patti herself does not fill a theatre when she represents the heroine of an uninteresting opera. Neither Esmeralda (Signor Campana's), Gelmina, nor Velléda obtained the least success, though all three were produced by Mme. Patti's special desire and were aided by her best efforts. We should have been glad to find more about prime donne as artists on the stage and something less of the American interviewer, though, at the same time, we are not always inclined to accept Mr. Edwards's criticism. That Signor Nicolini was, "after the retirement of Mario, the best tenor of his day," is an assertion that we certainly cannot support; nor does it seem to us reasonable on the author's part to say that, "disapproving of his conduct, the British public also disapproved of his singing"—the implication being that he was condemned as an artist for purely private reasons. The American public also disapproved of Signor Nicolini, and American critics satirized his performances in their own peculiar, but in its way effective, fashion. Mr. Edwards, indeed, himself points out the great defect in this tenor's singing; "his voice left something to be desired—it was wanting in firmness" he admits. This is a mild statement of the fact that he had ruined his voice by bad production, that he was sorely given to shouting, and that the vice of the tremolo, which English audiences have the good taste to abominate, was more painfully conspicuous in his singing than in that of any other vocalist who has been heard in London. Of Mme. Albani Mr. Edwards writes with exaggerated enthusiasm; the critic disappears in the eulogist. A few years since Mme. Albani's shake was, in truth, not a shake at all, and great praise is due to her for the diligence with which she has practised to improve it; but Mr. Edwards oversteps the mark in describing it now as "marvellous." The book has little critical value because the weak points of the various singers are not touched upon by the too amiable writer. Good service would have been done to the cause of art if the author had cautioned young singers against the extravagances which are apt to mar the very capable and skilful vocalization of Mme. Albani. On the other hand, very much less than justice is done to Mme. Lucca, who is richly gifted with that dramatic capacity which is equally rare and valuable. There is much in these volumes which suggests the casual newspaper essay. They are certainly not nearly as good as Mr. Sutherland Edwards could have made them had he cared to devote time and care to his task. He is, however, well versed in musical matters, and will amuse readers who are interested in opera and its exponents.

ST. MARY BOURNE.*

A LARGE and handsome volume, such as the one before us, on the history of a single parish, deserves to be treated with some respect; for it declares that its author loves and reverences his subject, and has treated it in the ample, leisurely fashion which distinguishes the work of a past generation of local antiquaries. The parish of St. Mary Bourne, in Northern Hampshire, though destitute of any historical associations, affords abundant materials for archæological discussion in the shape of the remains of pit-dwellings, flint instruments, barrows, and a small camp. Of all these Mr. Stevens gives a full account, illustrated by some clearly-drawn engravings. He traces the history of the manor of Hurstbourne Priors, the seat of the Earls of Portsmouth, from its first appearance in a charter of the reign of Egbert down to the present time, enlarges on the old customs of the village, on its revel, and on the use of the stocks and the scold's bridle; describes the churches of St. Mary Bourne and Hurstbourne, gives extracts from the parish books and the assize and subsidy rolls, and has collected several notices of the neighbouring forest of Chute and Finkley, from the reign of Henry III. to its partial disafforestation by Charles II. for the benefit of a member of the loyal house of Paulet. Thorough as his work is on all purely local matters, he goes wildly astray when he ventures on points of wider importance. He holds antiquated notions as to the relations between tithings and hundreds, translates "carucata" by "a plough," and announces, on the authority of Hutchins's History of Dorset, that tithes are "first expressly mentioned in the constitution (sic) of Egbert, Archbishop of York"; he has evidently never heard of the undoubtedly genuine Penitential of Archbishop Theodore. The ceorl, he says, "was in the lowest grade of husbandmen"; he has naturally forborne to describe the higher grades. He is much exercised by the Domesday entry that certain thegns might "go whither they would," and considers that "the remark seems to imply that they had not inherited but acquired freedom of locomotion," which is certainly a very queer comment. His ideas as to historical authority may be gathered from his reference to "Brompton" as the authority for the statement that the Conqueror blinded men who killed hart or hind, and the value of his etymological [illegible] from the suggestion that the first syllable of Hysseburn, [illegible] under which Hurstbourne appears in King Alfred's will, may mean "his or of him," and "refer to the place as the property of the King; for it formerly belonged to him."

The Glossary of provincial words used in Northern Hampshire, to be found at the end of the volume, contains such verbs as to "chaff," to "chuck," to "crib," and to "hide," and such nouns as "flail," "pip," and "quod," all of which we fancy we have heard frequently in many other parts of England; indeed, there are not a dozen words in this Glossary that are not in general use, at least among the agricultural poor.

ETON CLASSICAL BOOKS.*

MR. CORNISH'S Notes to the Odes, Carmen Sæculare, and Epodes of Horace are said to be intended for the use of boys in the lower and middle forms of a public school. They are bound in a separate volume from the text, which has been published in advance. They are elementary, but, on the whole, business-like. The fault is that too much help is given, and sometimes it is given in the wrong way. At Co. III. xii. 4-6, on

> Tibi qualum Cythereæ puer ales, tibi telas
> Operosæque Minervæ studium aufert, Neobule, > Liparæi nitor Hebri, &c.

Mr. Cornish (as at many other places) arranges the words in their grammatical order:—"puer ales (adj.) Cythereæ aufert qualum tibi, Neobule; nitor Liparæi Hebri aufert telas &c. tibi." This is to descend to Anthon's level, and to rob a Latin lesson of any mental stimulus which it might have administered. It would be better to give an honest crib, and let the boy sort the words for himself. To tell him that amando = amore (without telling him that the ablative gerund is very seldom used transitively), and that non indecoro = decoro, is to be superfluous and useless; and to distinguish (three times over) between lĕvis and lēvis is to demoralize a boy by teaching him to rely on his book instead of his brains. It would do him more good to make his mistake and receive the appropriate correction. Here and there Mr. Cornish has omitted to give a note where it would be required, as e.g. on the superior power to calm as well as to raise the Hadriatic waves which Horace has attributed to the South wind. On the fatherly kindness shown by Proculeius to his brothers it is not enough to say "the gen. means in respect of"; and the famous sustulerat nisi, &c. is curtly dismissed—"sustulerat = sustulisset, but a more vivid expression." The grammatical explanations are not free from an ambiguity of expression which an unkindly critic would regard as the symptom of mental confusion at Co. I. xxxviii.:—

> Simplici myrto nihil allabores
> Sedulus curo.

Mr. Cornish declares allabores to be "a jussive subjunctive dependent on curo." (Perhaps he is right in not saying which verb is qualified by the sedulus.) On Titanas immanemque turmam he says that the -que is redundant; a criticism which would be itself redundant, even if it were correct. In his note on the matrimonial endearments of Mæcenas and "Licymnia" Mr. Cornish misses a point by not minding his moods. He translates, "the kisses which it gives her more pleasure to yield than you to ask." The mood of gaudeat and the strong expression eripi point to the lady's being secretly annoyed because the gentleman is parleying when he ought to take the citadel by storm. At iii. 3, 55 Mr. Cornish talks about "a relative sentence (qua parte debacchentur ignes) depending on visere" in "visere gestiens." But, taken as a whole, the book is correct and useful. Mr. Cornish is careful to mark prosodical or metrical anomalies, such as manēt before humor, siliŭa, and the hiatus in the reading Dædaleo | ocior. The allusions to names and places are sufficiently explained; and the passages which present a reasonable choice of different versions are clearly, but shortly, discussed. It is not to be expected in a book intended for young boys that the familiar cruces should receive a final or a novel treatment, as e.g. Ep. v. 87, 88:—

> Venena magnum fas nefasque non valent
> Convertere humanam vicem.

This is rendered, "Sorceries have no power to change the great [laws of] right and wrong as if they were human affairs." This is very far indeed from being plausible; but Mr. Cornish is justified in saying that the couplet is difficult and the reading doubtful. Judged by the standard of classical books intended for school use Mr. Cornish's "Notes to Horace" is a considerable performance.

A very different rank is taken by the Eton Latin Grammar, which has been compiled and written by Mr. Rawlins and Mr. Inge. The name of the book is familiar, but the appearance of it will give a severe shock to the veterans who learned their declensions and conjugations in the dear old antiquated, sensible Eton Latin Grammar. It is the fashion to congratulate, but we are more inclined to commiserate, the rising generation on the books which are published for their instruction. When we had learned the old Eton Grammar by heart, we felt ourselves able to tackle any Latin author. We looked upon grammar, not as an [illegible] itself, but as the means without which we could not understand our Cæsar and Ovid, our Cicero and Virgil. It never occurred to us to ask how it was that the present infinitive passive of expleo came to be expleri. We simply accepted the fact. We knew that Lucretius chose to write explerier, but we attributed this fact partly to the well-known vagaries of all early writers, and partly to metrical considerations. We were inclined to apply Artemus Ward's remark on Chaucer, "He was a good poet, but he couldn't spell." But Mr. Inge and Mr. Rawlins, following the new guides in scholarship, and going back to old writers and ancient inscriptions, start with the bold assertion that the infin. act. in -se, -rĕ, and -rĕ, is an old locative case, which in one instance (fieri) appears as -ri. Probably, therefore, the -r in explerier, &c., is equivalent to the -se; the ĕ is a link vowel; and the -ri- is either a form such as in fieri, with the i weakened to i (as in audiet), or the ordinary inf. act. form in -rĕ changed to -ri to avoid the double e. If this theory is correct (it appears to be original with Messrs. Rawlins and Inge), the conclusion is that only the forms in -ier "are really middle" (passive), and that the forms in -i "are really active." Our only present objection is to the use of the word "really," by which, we presume, "originally" is meant. It would not be fair to quote this as a sample of the grammatical theories which are advanced and (many of them) established in The Eton Latin Grammar. This is a confessedly speculative passage. A similar point is discussed in one of the Appendices—"On the Future Forms in -SO (-SSO), -SIM (-SSIM), (-SSERE), and -SITUR (-SSITUR)." There is throughout the book a scientific determination to explain the classical forms by tracing them back through archaic survivals to their primitive origins, chiefly by help of the more or less ascertained "Laws of Sound Change," such as the tendency of every vowel to sink towards i, down the scale a, o, u, e, i; the insertion of a link vowel (to bridge over a difficulty of pronunciation); the assimilation of consonants by consonants; the loss of consonants before consonants; and the loss of final consonants. Sometimes these principles are supported by examples which are themselves hypothetical, as when it is assumed (in illustration of the last-named tendency) that in the declension of -a stems (First Declension) there once existed an Old Latin form in -ais for the nominative plural. An analogous liberty is taken with regard to the nominative plural in the declension of o- stems (Second Declension), where it is assumed that an original form existed in -ois. It is fair to say that every statement which is unverified, and every argument which rests even partly on hypothetical grounds, are frankly stated for just as much as they are worth. There is no attempt to obscure a possible objection or to conceal any weak link in the chain of reasoning. The only serious fault which can be found in that part of the book which is devoted to Accidence is that the tendency to treat normal and exceptional forms upon terms of perfect equality makes it a dangerous book for any but advanced students. If Latin grammar is to be studied scientifically (a question which seems to have been decided, and which we do not wish to raise), it would be impossible to lay a more solid foundation than by mastering the new Eton Latin Grammar. But, unless boys are more clever and more industrious than they used to be, they will be detained so long with the grammar that they will never reach the authors. It cannot be said that the Syntax has been quite brought up to modern requirements. There are no marked deficiencies, there is not a single inaccuracy which we could detect, but the treatment is skimpy, dogmatic, and even irrational. Some of the explanations of familiar constructions are plainly insufficient, as in the case of "the accusative and infinitive." The infinitive (a semi-abstract verbal substantive) is declared to be too impersonal and substantival in its nature to stand as a predicate to a nominative subject; therefore, the "subject of the infinitive" is to be regarded as the field of action of the verb; and, therefore, it must be put in the accusative. No attempt is made to explain the accusative which is combined by poets and poetical writers with "the passive (middle) forms of active verbs used reflexively," as in Lævo suspensi loculos tabulamque lacerto; and it is not correct to limit the construction to nouns standing for "parts of the body" or to verbs of donning and doffing. One of the best passages in the book is the very clear appendix on the "future perfect and aorist subjunctive," a matter of importance in Syntax as well as in Accidence, though both of these tenses in both voices are in form identical with the perfect subjunctive. The Roman methods of calculating the day of the month, the standards of measurement, and the varying systems of coinage, are succinctly explained. There is considerable merit in the treatment of the subjunctive mood, especially so far as it is concerned with the different kinds of conditional sentences. Elaborate rules are laid down for the pronunciation of the Latin vowels, consonants, and diphthongs. The reasons are not stated. That was, perhaps, as well. It is difficult to understand why the appendix was added which professes to deal with the styles of Sallust, Livy, and Tacitus within the narrow limits of three pages. Cicero, it may be mentioned, is left severely alone. It is still more difficult to imagine why Sallust is declared to be "the first Latin prose writer who paid any attention to style." To drop Cicero out of the question, Cæsar is generally supposed to have taken considerable pains, and to have achieved some little success, in Latin prose composition. Again, it is a bold thing to assign to Seneca the first place among the writers of his time, considering that he was contemporary with Persius, Lucan, and Petronius, and overlapped with Martial, Juvenal, and Quintilian. In a book of the magnitude, importance, and difficulty of The Eton Latin Grammar it would not be hard to detect shortcomings, but such as they are they are greatly counterbalanced by sterling merits. The book has come out in time to occupy a vacant place in classical scholarship, and it will not be easily superseded, especially as it is intended to subject future editions to "such revision and amendment as may seem requisite to the school authorities from time to time." It is pleasant to find that a school which has always been associated with all that was best and brightest and most elegant in the old-fashioned scholarship has shown itself able to grasp, assimilate, and reproduce the solid and subtle results of modern research and recent speculation.

MR. FROUDE is not only a prolific writer of books himself, but he is also a fertile cause of books being written. His English in the West Indies bids fair to be the bone of contention which will be fought over at Anti-slavery meetings or Planters' Associations, and it will be quoted with approbation or disgust as suits the views of the combatants. This must cause Mr. Froude considerable amusement. Mr. Salmon was once President of the island of Nevis, and in that capacity was familiar with a portion of the black population of the British West Indies; he was also formerly Colonial Secretary and Administrator of the Gold Coast, and as such may be supposed to know something of the African at home. He therefore claims to speak with much greater authority on the subject of this race than Mr. Froude, whose experience of the West Indies was only during a visit of a few weeks, and who once made a trip to South Africa, from whence none of the slaves in bygone times were drafted. Yet this fund of knowledge has been stored up for years, and this scheme of a "Caribbean Confederation," which may be cited as the short title of Mr. Salmon's book with a very long name, would never have seen the light if it had not been for Mr. Froude. Perhaps the solution lies in this; President, Secretary, Administrator, and Commissioner though he has been, Mr. Salmon is, before all things, a member of the Cobden Club, and his acute perceptions detect a veiled attack upon opinions dear to that political body. He says:—

> What, then, is the object of this [Mr. Froude's] book? Its object is to put before us in a pleasant way Mr. Froude's theories on government generally. . . . Mr. Froude went to the West Indies and returns with a figure of the British black man draped out of all recognition as a warning to Englishmen to avoid that unclean thing, local self-government. Mr. Froude stands behind the black man to deliver his blows at somebody nearer home.

If for "local self-government" we read the words "Home Rule," we shall better grasp Mr. Salmon's meaning, and be able to put life into the mysterious Somebody; we can then conjure up the striking picture of Mr. Froude tilting at Mr. Gladstone from behind a negro—a fine subject which we recommend to the notice of Punch. As a member of the Cobden Club, also, Mr. Salmon is naturally not humorous, or he would see the absurdity of charging Mr. Froude with a want of accuracy. He admits that the book is a brilliant and interesting one, and we can imagine Mr. Froude lifting his hands in amazement and asking what more he expects. Good English, picturesque descriptions of men and things, eloquent sketches of history, touched up it may be with local colour, these are what people demand of Mr. Froude, and they get them. But accuracy! surely we have learnt long ago not to expect such a commonplace thing as that. The gist of the contention is, that while Mr. Froude considers that the West Indies in general and the negro in particular would benefit by being placed under autocratic but paternal rule, Mr. Salmon would establish at once a scheme of "local self-government" for every island, with a low franchise to allow the black man to exercise full political rights, so that the control might not be in the hands of a white oligarchy. He points to Barbados as a place where the franchise is reasonably low, and where the island has always practically governed itself, with the result that it has, on the whole, since emancipation, been the most prosperous of the West India group. "The Barbadian black man," he says, "is noted for being the most intelligent labourer in the West Indies." But he leaves out of his calculations that from her prosperity Barbados has been able to spend more upon education than her less fortunate sister islands. She now devotes 15,000*l.* per annum to education, or more than 10 per cent. of her entire revenue, and the expenditure is gradually bearing fruit. Surely Mr. Salmon would admit that in the islands where, from failure of revenue or other causes, education is very backward, the negro (omitting the exceptions which exist everywhere) is not as yet fitted for full political rights. It is no use to write grand passages about the capacities of the Africans in their native state, to say, "If rightly approached, we find the people capable of religious fervency and steadfastness; if supplied with schools, we see them eagerly filled; if scholarship be put in their way, we see them acquire it and retain it; and, what is more and better, we see them become masters in their turn to pass on the torch to their backward brethren. They love the Bible and become expert theologians, fitted to found sees and to gather together and direct congregations"; or, again, to tell us "there are countless provinces where a chief of ancient descent lives a patriarchal life, respected by his people"; and that the "slave-dealer and the gin-bottle" have been the only hindrances to the African's attaining a civilization as high as ours, if, indeed, he did not attain to it formerly; for the records of it, Mr. Salmon thinks, "may perhaps be buried for ever in the densities of jungle and forest." All this, even if it were true, would be beside the mark, and it is too late to descant upon the evils of slavery and its results; the problem in the West Indies is to deal with the negro as he is, not as he might be or as he ought to be. As to his character, there has been a great deal of exaggeration on both sides. Too much has been said of his laziness; what is meant is that he is improvident. As long as he is at work he will do his work fairly well; and, if it is of a kind he likes, the amount he will get through is astonishing. But he does not see the necessity for laying by, and does not care to work for much more than will support him; in which he probably does not stand alone. He is sober, most likely beyond his fellows anywhere; and here we should like to ask the question, How is it that the African, when in his grand wild state which we are so often told about, is so prone to the attractions of the "gin-bottle," while his brother, degraded, as we are also told, by the remembrance or traditions of slavery, having rum produced around him in abundance, and cheaper than anywhere in the world, remains quite untouched by its influence? Has slavery done something for him after all? He is cheerful, contented with little, and capable of lasting and ardent attachment; and yet with all his good qualities there is much that is still wanting. His vague ideas about meum and tuum, his unsatisfactory notions about domestic morality, the ease with which he is swayed by any passing oratory or political agitator, and, in spite of Mr. Salmon's "scholars" and "expert theologians," the generally retrograde progress of his intellect after he has attained the age of fourteen or fifteen, all tend to show that to grant him as yet absolute political power would be as great a mistake now as it was fifty years ago to turn him loose from slavery without providing for his mental equipment. Some of us have tasted the champagnes of 1884; they are as yet raw and green, but with elements of great promise; if we drank much of them now they would probably disagree with us very seriously, but if kept for a few years, with proper treatment they will be as good wines as were ever produced. Mr. Salmon wants us to drink them all now.

Nor does the climax of his scheme commend itself more to our admiration. Mr. Salmon proposes that the fifteen States (including British Guiana and Honduras) comprised in the vast area of the West Indies should send members to a General Assembly in proportion to their population. Where this Assembly is to be held he does not even venture to suggest, but the members are to be 142 in number and to be elected every three years. Above them is to be a Senate of 46 members, and also an Executive Council presided over by a Governor-General. Without going into minor details, conceive the difficulty of getting this great body of duly qualified men to take a long journey every year, to sacrifice weeks if not months of their valuable time (and if the talkative negro were largely present it would be many months) for the purpose of legislating for islands which the majority have never visited, and of whose circumstances they know nothing; for it cannot be too often insisted on that the conditions of different islands are as different as the poles. Nor, if Mr. Salmon's scheme of "local self-government" were acted upon, would the Assembly appear to be of much use, unless it might give an opportunity for the poorer colonies to dive into the pockets of the richer—a proceeding which would bring about disintegration at once. We quite agree with Mr. Salmon that there is great waste in the present system of administration, and the amount of the official salary list is out of proportion to the existing revenues of the islands; but we doubt if the surplus on his scheme would be realized anywhere but on paper, for the expense of providing steam communication, and housing the huge legislative body with the various officials would be immense. With him also we desire to see the principle of self-government extended as much as possible; but it must be carefully done, and according to the conditions of each particular colony, and we fear that his scheme of Confederation would result in as great a sham as that lately perpetrated in the Leeward Islands.

Mr. Powles is quite right in thinking that the majority of Englishmen know next to nothing of the Bahamas, and we would fain hope that his description of the existing state of things is overdrawn, otherwise the Colonial Office has even more sins to answer for than we believed. For The Land of the Pink Pearl is not merely a descriptive work; it is the outcome of a man with a grievance, who pours out a very considerable amount of venom against the land which has cast him forth. It is interesting to note that Mr. Powles calls for a Royal Commission to investigate the affairs of the colony, while Mr. Salmon utterly repudiates the conclusions of the Royal Commissioners sent out to the West Indies in 1885. If half what Mr. Powles alleges be true, there is room, indeed, for vast improvement; but there is nothing which a strong Governor, backed by the Colonial Office, could not effect. The Truck system, for instance, might be easily abolished; and any difference of the administration of justice between black and white should be met by the removal of the offending magistrate. It is incredible that a resident justice should have fined five black men twenty shillings each for entering a door of a Methodist Chapel which the white men were in the habit of using, without incurring the censure of the Governor. We commend this instance, as well as an account of a visit to a Shouter Church, to the notice of Mr. Salmon, who is of opinion that Dissenting bodies will be the spiritual regeneration of the West Indies. These colonies are in no need of heroic legislative experiments; they have for the most part just laws, which must be firmly administered, and of course without respect to persons. What is wanted to ensure their prosperity is for the mother country to have some regard for them in the making of treaties and the construction of favoured-nation clauses; or to give them the right of making treaties for themselves. With prosperity will come increased education, schools of art, and further developments which will instruct and stimulate varied industries. But it must be understood that Great Britain is not going to ignore the interests of the West Indies any longer; the world must know that they are on an assured basis, for without stability there will be no capital forthcoming.

THE origin and precise signification of the term tarots, tarocs, or tarocchi, is involved in obscurity. According to one interpretation, it refers to the pattern on the backs of the early playing cards, which were marked with lines crossing lozenge-wise and with little spots. Père Menestrier, in his Bibliothèque curieuse et instructive, published in 1704, conceives that it was from these fretted lines that cards were named Tarcuits and Cartes Tarautées, and says that Tare is the same word as trou. The term was used in France at an early period, for Chatto mentions in his History of Playing Cards that the company, or guild, of cardmakers of Paris call themselves Tarotiers in their statutes of 1594. Another interpretation connects the term with the face only of the cards; and an attempt has been made, which Chatto does not consider to be based on any good evidence, to distinguish between Tarocchi or Tarots, properly so called, consisting of painted or engraved figures, and ordinary, or numeral, cards consisting of four suits. Court de Gebelin published in 1781 a dissertation in which he finds in cards an abstract of Egyptian learning; the name Tarocchi, he says, is pure Egyptian, being composed of TAR signifying road, and Roo, which means royal; thus we have Tarog, Tarocchi—the Royal Road. On this derivation Chatto remarks in a note that "by such a road as this Mons. Court de Gebelin seems to have arrived at much of his recondite knowledge of things unknown."

Mr. MacGregor Mathers, in the little volume under review, seems to have improved on this hint of De Gebelin's, and to have struck out a new royal road of his own. From the combinations of the Tarots he deduces, much to his own satisfaction, a complete system of fortune-telling, and finds an occult meaning even in the pips. He is not content with either of the above-mentioned etymologies, but hazards the conjecture that the name is derived "from the ancient hieroglyphical word 'târu,' to require an answer, or to consult"; hence tarot signifies that which is consulted, or from which an answer is required. Imperfect acquaintance with the ancient Egyptian tongue precludes criticism of this derivation, but exception may be taken to the expression "hieroglyphical word," which suggests a certain amount of doubt as to the correctness of the etymology. Surely hieroglyphs are not words, but ideograms—i.e. the signs used represent objects not sounds, as in phonetic writing. Occultism is, however, probably superior to such considerations. Mr. Mathers's title-page informs us that he has written a previous work, called The Kabbalah Unveiled; in the present treatise the veil is lifted somewhat higher, and he enters into what he is pleased to call the Qabalistical signification of the cards—a novelty in the way of spelling which is, perhaps, derived from an ancient Egyptian source, since modern dictionaries fail to give any authority for such a combination of letters.

A pack of Tarots consists of seventy-eight cards, and, from their greater number and variety of combinations, Mr. Mathers considers them far better adapted to fortune-telling than an ordinary pack. There are four suits of numeral cards which, instead of being designated as hearts, clubs, &c., bear the devices of swords, cups, bâtons, and money, clearly indicating their Spanish or Italian origin, as these designations are in use for ordinary cards at the present day in the South of Europe. Each of these suits has an additional honour or coat card—namely, the chevalier. There are besides twenty-two symbolical picture-cards, called Atous, or trumps, of which twenty-one are numbered consecutively from 1 to 21, the 22nd being marked Zero, O, and called the Fou; in playing the game this last card is usually designated Mat, from the Italian Matto (fool). It has of itself no positive value, but augments that of any of the other Atous to which it may be joined. Mr. Mathers is so fond of conjectural etymology that it is a pity that he should miss that of M. Duchesne for Atous, quoted by Chatto:—"Ces cartes sont dites a tutti, à tous; c'est-à-dire supérieures à toute autre, et n'appartenant à aucune couleur." Why Mr. Mathers goes out of his way to assert that Bastos or Bâtons answer to our diamonds, and Danari or money to clubs, it is not easy to see; club is a literal translation of Basto; while the Oros and Danari of Spain and Italy, which degenerated into simple squares (carreaux) in France, have in England retained the angular form of the latter, but have been transmuted to the name, very appropriate to their shape, of diamonds.

The designs of the twenty-one trump cards are extremely singular; in order to give some idea of the manner in which Mr. Mather uses them in fortune-telling it is necessary to mention them in detail, together with the general signification which he attaches to each of them. The would-be cartomancer may then draw his own particular conclusions, and he will find considerable latitude for framing them in accordance with his predilections. It should further be mentioned that each of the cards when reversed conveys a meaning the contrary of its primary signification. No. 1 is the Bateleur or Juggler, called also Pagad; the latter designation is adduced by Court de Gebelin in proof of the Oriental origin of Tarots, it being derived from PAG, chief or master, and GAD, fortune. The Juggler symbolizes Will. 2. The High Priestess, or female Pope, represents Science, Wisdom, or Knowledge. 3. The Empress, is the symbol of Action or Initiative. 4. The Emperor, represents Realization or Development. 5. The Hierophant or Pope is the symbol of Mercy and Beneficence. 6. The Lovers, signify Wise Disposition and Trials surmounted. 7. The Chariot, represents Triumph, Victory over Obstacles. 8. Themis or Justice, symbolizes Equilibrium and Justice. 9. The Hermit, denotes Prudence. 10. The Wheel of Fortune, represents Fortune, good or bad. 11. Fortitude, symbolizes Power or Might. 12. The Hanged Man—a man suspended head downwards by one leg—means Devotion, Self-Sacrifice. 13. Death, signifies Transformation or Change. 14. Temperance, typifies Combination. 15. The Devil, is the image of Fate or Fatality. 16. The Lightning-struck Tower, called also Maison-Dieu, shows Ruin, Disruption. 17. The Star, is the emblem of Hope. 18. The Moon, symbolizes Twilight, Deception and Error. 19. The Sun, signifies Earthly Happiness. 20. The Last Judgment, means Renewal, Determination of a matter. 21. The Universe represents Completion and Reward. 0. The Foolish Man, signifies Expiation or Wavering. Separate meanings, with their respective converses, are also attached to each of the other cards in the pack, so that when they have been dealt out and arranged in any of the combinations recommended by the author for purposes of divination, the inquirer has only to use this little volume as a dictionary in order to read his fate. The gaps, it appears, he is at liberty to fill in according to his skill or discretion. The following quotation may be taken as a fair sample of the high-sounding platitudes which result from judicious management, since it is given by Mr. Mathers as a connected reading from the whole series of the twenty-two trumps:—

> The Human Will (1) enlightened by Science (2), and manifested by Action (3), should find its Realization (4) in deeds of Mercy and Beneficence (5); the Wise Disposition (6) of this will give him Victory (7) through Equilibrium (8) and Prudence (9), over the fluctuations of Fortune (10). Fortitude (11), sanctified by Sacrifice of Self (12), will triumph over Death (13) itself, and thus a wise Combination (14) will enable him to defy Fate (15). In each Misfortune (16) he will see the Star of Hope (17) shine through the twilight of Deception (18), and ultimate Happiness (19) will be the Result (20). Folly (0), on the other hand, will bring about an evil Reward (21).

Mr. Mathers is careful to impress upon his readers that, not only must the pack be thoroughly shuffled and cut, with the double object of turning some cards upside down and of altering their position and sequence in the pack, but also that during this shuffling and cutting the inquirer must think earnestly of the matter concerning which he is anxious for information; for, unless he does this, the cards will rarely read correctly. It is some consolation for those who are not able to fix their attention on the cards with sufficient earnestness to extract from them a correct reading of the future to find that a Tarot pack may be employed for the less recondite purpose of present amusement. Mr. Chatto, in his exhaustive work on playing-cards, has stated that the kind of game for which the emblematical figures, usually called Tarocchi cards, were used, remains to be discovered. Whether Mr. Mathers has been fortunate enough to make this discovery, or has evolved a system and set of rules out of his own inner consciousness, he does not tell us; be that as it may, he devotes half a dozen pages to an explanation in detail of a mode of play available for two or three persons. All the cards except three are dealt out, thus each hand holds twenty-five cards, which must be rather a handful. The method of scoring somewhat resembles piquet, in that the players score combinations which they have in their hand as well as tricks which they make in play. The game must be somewhat tedious, since, independently of the great number of cards to be sorted, combined, and played, the points made by the loser are deducted from the winner at the end of each hand, and only the excess points scored towards the hundred which are required to complete a game. In the early pages of his treatise Mr. Mathers makes some mysterious allusions to the occult meanings of these wonderful Tarot cards, and at the end, after his explanation of their use for playing purposes, he reverts to their Qabalistical signification. The ordinary pack of fifty-two cards has, he says, long been known to be susceptible of peculiar numerical combinations; they suggest, for instance, the fifty-two weeks in the year, the four suits the four seasons, the twelve picture-cards the twelve months, and so forth. But, concealed behind their apparently arbitrary and bizarre designs, the Tarot cards contain a far more complicated system of recondite symbolism; they consist, Mr. Mathers points out, of the ten numbers of the decimal scale, counterchanged with the tetrad, combined with a primitive hieroglyphical alphabet of twenty-two letters, thus symbolizing the elements, the planets, and the twelve signs of the Zodiac. This demonstrates, we are to believe, the ancient and religious origin of the Tarots, and carries us back to a period anterior to Moses and the learning which he borrowed from the Egyptians. Is Mr. Mather poking fun at us, or does he expect to be taken au grand sérieux? Apparently the latter; for the pages at the end contain a select list of works on occult science issued by his publisher. Volumes, Mr. Mather says, might be written without exhausting the subject of these mysterious symbols; but, happily for us, space does not allow him to enter further into it.

NOVELS.*

BEYOND COMPARE is a capital romance, of what may be called the rustic melodramatic type. Abraham Durrant, a rich old yeoman-farmer, dies in the presence of his sister, Mrs. Eldridge. Her son, as he comes up to the house, looks under the lowered blinds and sees her rummaging in an old bureau. When he enters the house she solemnly hands over to him the dead man's keys; and, consequently, when she sees a light and hears stealthy footsteps in the chamber of death, she naturally concludes that her son Elwyn must be there, as no one else could have unlocked the door. After the funeral the will is missing, and in its place an obviously-forged document is found, bequeathing everything to Mrs. Eldridge. From these circumstances arise misunderstandings and cross-purposes which are not cleared up until we reach the last chapter. Elwyn thinks that his mother must have been tampering with the will when he saw her at the bureau, whereas she was really only recovering an old love-letter. She thinks that Elwyn stole the true will and substituted the forged one for it during the night. The deceased Mr. Durrant left two sons, named respectively Preston and Howard, who naturally do not acquiesce in the loss of their inheritance, albeit Preston, the elder, who is a spendthrift, drunkard, and gambler, has for some years been paid a small allowance by his father on condition that he keeps out of his sight. At this point matters are further complicated by the arrival of a "Captain" Guyton Brasnet, a sporting friend of Preston's, who straightway begins to make love to Berta, Elwyn's "intended," and so works upon the fears of the miserable mother and son for each other that he at last extorts a promise from Elwyn to give up his suit, since Preston, who is Brasnet's "creature," gives them to understand that, unless Brasnet marries Berta, Elwyn will be prosecuted for forgery. Persecuted by Brasnet, and apparently deserted by her lover, who dare not open his lips for his mother's sake, Berta stands quite alone, but keeps her troth to Elwyn most heroically, and it is more by her quick wit than by Elwyn's deeds of "derring do" that the mystery is cleared up. Brasnet is an absurdly transpontine villain. Why he should go night after night to show lights in an old tower wherein he has built up the documents on which the story hinges can only be explained by the same reasoning by which Tom Sawyer proved to his sceptical friend that when they became pirates they would have orgies—"I don't know what an orgy is, but pirates always has 'em, so I suppose we're bound to." Now, a villain of melodrama is nothing without a ruined tower wherein to disport himself at midnight; so thither Captain Brasnet betakes himself night after night, all for nothing; for who in the nineteenth century, having a sheet of notepaper to conceal, would put it in an iron box, take the iron box to a ruined tower—some one else's property, be it observed—and build it into the base of the wall? How could he get mortar? Does the writer know the fierce light which beats upon a stranger in a village; the keen espionage to which all his movements are subjected; the intense curiosity which any odd conduct on his part excites, and the ingenuity with which the worst possible construction is put upon the simplest act? If he did, he never would imagine that Captain Brasnet's midnight visits to his tower would not, as soon as they became known, be the signal for all able-bodied men and women for miles round to assemble there.

The scene of this novel is laid in Norfolk. All the action takes place between Norwich and Yarmouth, near the sea coast and in the "Broad" district, à propos of which there is a fine "situation" when a wherry loaded with hay catches fire. All the names are either Norfolk family names or the names of Norfolk villages—e.g. Costessy, the name of the doctor, locally pronounced "Cossey." The local dialect, too, is most truthfully rendered, in the absence of final s in all persons of verbs, and in such words as "fare" for "appear," "kinder," &c. It is not, however, an Eastern counties' peculiarity to fail to distinguish between "will" and "shall," as almost all the characters in Beyond Compare seem to do. The "white ladies," ghostly coaches and four, and other superstitions are all to be found among the Norfolk peasantry. Altogether, the book is constructed on a somewhat antiquated model, but it is a good specimen of its kind.

In It is Written Miss Fielder-King has apparently set herself the task of imitating Ouida's early bad manner, itself an imitation of the style of the author of Guy Livingstone. Everything is superlative; all the characters have magnificent beauty, unspeakable virtue, or wickedness, as the case may be, and poetic names. While mentioning names, we may remark that there is an actual Lord Delamere in existence, and that to take the names and titles of living peers in vain in this manner is generally considered to be in bad taste. Neither do we think that men in the exalted regions in which Miss Fielder-King's characters move wear quite so many "priceless" brilliants on their fingers. The erudition displayed in It is Written is quite in the style of Mr. Burnand's immortal parody Strapmore. Besides the quotation from "the old sweet Greek chorus," one of the heroes, on being rejected by a young lady, presents her with a "priceless" diamond ring, within which is engraved "TUA ETERNA DEVOTA"; and when a little boy dies, his father inscribes on his tombstone, in old Greek letters, "In Memory of R. S. A. Obiit September 20, 18—."

The story turns upon the efforts of two people to carry out their "destiny," Kismet, or "elective affinities"—for all these names are given to their attachment. He, Colonel Anstruther, is married to a heartless and profligate woman; she, Mrs. Delaval, is married to a husband who ill-treats her. There are several minor villains, whose plots come to nought, as might be expected from their habit of rehearsing them in the presence of faithful servants of Colonel Anstruther. There are railway accidents, gun accidents, and yacht accidents to diversify the course of the story; a scene at Newmarket, where the air is rent with cries of "Fifty to one on Kismet" (Colonel Anstruther's horse), "A thousand to one on the favourite," and so forth. Mrs. Anstruther elopes with one Alphonso Auterlitz (sic), "a scion of a noble Austrian family," whose mistress she had formerly been. Her husband obtains a divorce, and when returning from a trip round the world in a yacht, "at whose helm hung the ensign of the R. Y. S.," runs down another yacht in a snowstorm (!) off the Needles. This other yacht contains Colonel Anstruther's ex-wife. He supports her in the icy water for so long a time that when they are rescued she dies and he hovers for a while between life and death; but when Mrs. Delaval, now a widow, comes to his bedside, and goes through the ceremony of marriage with him, he recovers, and they live happily ever afterwards.

The Christian names of the female characters in this book, as far as we have been able to ascertain them, are Vega, Veda, Auda, Luna, and Freda. Some of the sentences are quite beyond us—as, for instance, a young lady says to her mother, "I heartily hope that when Papa decides upon a place in the country it will be where there is a good junction to keep unpleasant visitors from swooping down upon us poor innocent beings"; or, again, "It would not do to let her know the worse come to the worse, and evidence failing, that I intended getting a divorce." We do not know what we are to understand by a "massive mullioned gateway"; a "filmy but deep mourning handkerchief" sounds ambiguous; and, if "reliable" be objectionable, what are we to say of "unassailable reliability"? What are we to say of "Nemisis," "There is no media course," "you will arrangé," "haven where he feign would be," "'Judge not' wrung in her ear," "Places aux dames," "the circe who would lure them to destruction," &c.? These mistakes cannot be all due to the printers; nevertheless, there is a certain power in some parts of the book which leads us to think that, by taking more pains and thought, the writer might rise above her present linen-draper's-apprentice style of fiction and construct a really readable story. We would counsel her to leave the French language alone, and to remember the advice of an eminent Oxford coach to his pupils, "Read over what you have written, and, if anything strikes you as particularly fine—cut it out."

THE EXPLANATION OF ALL THINGS.*

TILL 12·15 on the 6th of June, 1888, there were things not perfectly understanded by us. In that happy moment we took up The Anointed Seraph, and it became plain that he who could understand this book would never find any mystery unintelligible. The author, Mr. Pollock, was walking around Boston Common with another man, and, on returning home, found a Bible on his table. It contained the text "The one shall be taken and the other left." The other man was "taken," he disappeared for days, and soon after he was "taken" again, "and was not seen for many months." The state of the American law as to private asylums may, or may not, account for his having been "taken." Meanwhile, his companion was "left"—to himself, and he wrote The Anointed Seraph. He had previously been recognized by a lady, who remarked on his kingly brow a silver crescent "in the centre of which was a pig with a spear on his back." All the Pollocks do not wear their crest on their open countenances, and we are not even certain that Mr. G. H. Pollock's pig was visible, except to the inspired lady. She also read a record of events which were written on Mr. Pollock's nature, and that Record is The Anointed Seraph. We need not detain the reader with matter so elementary as the "Origin of the World Soul." Every one understands its connexion with the eleven primitive Suns, whose teams used to pitch the wickets in "the wilderness of space." Our solar centre is the eleventh sun, and our earth is made of the disturbed stellar lights. "It is like a picnic; Taurus contributes the water, and Orion did not forget the salt." "Black Hair came from Aquarius"—and we presume [illegible] was jugged. Somewhat in Mr. Laurence Oliphant's manner, Mr. Pollock describes the origin of sex. "Sex must end where [illegible] shall have been evolved the complete woman"—an event which appears to occur every day. Woman is to have the last word. When it is added that Judaism was grafted upon the Egyptian mysteries, and that the transverse branch of the cross is symbolic of evolution, even the feeblest intellect will understand that we all need excavation, and when the pile of débris is piled around and outside of us, may we not be "what there is left of what was once a pirate," and possibly have "a treasure with us"? The reference to copyright legislation is clear. This is indeed "a dual world." The reader who has followed this rather hasty attempt at epitomizing The Anointed Seraph will be sorry to hear that "a maiden countenance which gives expression to all Divine qualities cannot be executed on a woodcut illustration." Otherwise the frontispiece would be worthy of this remarkably lucid and probable explanation of all things.

TOUTE LA LYRE.*

THE editors of the posthumous works of Victor Hugo must have got nearly to the bottom of the fabled or historical chests of MSS. which, during his early youth, during his flourishing time of poethood and peerhood when Louis Philippe was king, during the long years of exile, and during the latest period of all, when, taught by severe, but not unjust, political disappointment, he resigned himself to a sort of living apotheosis in Paris, the poet steadily filled, and only partially emptied by his constant and voluminous publication. Only a "volume de théâtre" is announced as still "in preparation" on the back of the present volumes; yet they would by themselves be sufficiently astonishing even if there had not been three before them and were not to be another after them—as sheaves left ungarnered in the fields of a man who from eighteen to eighty-three had been an indefatigable publisher of poetry. They have the same characteristics as all the volumes of verse subsequent to the Châtiments, not to mention some of those before that turning-point. They contain pieces which are dated from, and which (there is no reason for doubting) were written at, almost all ages of the writer's life. There are quite early poems in fantastic metres which might have figured, had the author pleased, beside the "Pas d'armes du roi Jean" or the Pirates' Song; there are not a few of the charming lyrics which, though he never lost the secret of them, came from him at their best in the twenty years between 1830 and 1850; there is a great deal of the sombre and rather monotonous, but still splendid, musing on nature and fate which is chiefly represented in the Contemplations; there are one or two pieces which would not have been out of place in the Légende; and there are more than one or two which (we are sorry to have to say it) could not have been much more out of place than some of the actual contents of the Année terrible.

This singular chronological peculiarity has marked all the later issues of Victor Hugo's work, and it is, we think, the one in which he stands most alone. The voluminous author who "clears his stock" of verse or prose continually only to replenish it, and the niggardly-critical author who can hardly bring himself to publish at all, lest his gems should not be sufficiently picked and polished, are both intelligible enough, and, so to speak, common enough. But that a man should be at the same time so voluminous and so critical, so prodigal and so careful, is certainly curious.

It is possible that a very severe critic may refuse to recognize in these volumes anything quite up to the standard of the best things in Torquemada and Les quatres vents de l'esprit, which we take to have been the two latest books in which as wholes the genius of Hugo as a whole was present. There is certainly nothing, though the character and dates of the collection are very similar, quite up to the exquisite or the "Staircase," or the ronde of the statues in the Quatre vents. But this kind of comparison is not very good criticism in itself, and will certainly not trouble the competent reader and lover of poetry who opens this book. As soon as any such has done this it may safely be said

Laissez tout ce qui tremble

Accepit solitam flammam notusque medullas
Intravit calor et labefacta per ossa cucurrit.

The preliminary verse opens with a line less happy than usual, at least to an English ear—and the first of the actual poems, "L'échafaud," deals, as may be anticipated, with one of the poet's least reasonable and (in verse) least happy "fads." But the fact is that it really matters very little what the exact subject is with which Hugo is dealing, and this fact accounts both for the extraordinary attraction which his verse exercises on those who are strongly impressed by the musical and technical appeal of poetry and by its dealings with certain great commonplaces—life, death, pity, terror, the sea, the sky—and for the puzzlement, the contempt, or the positive aversion which it excites in those who think that all depends on the particular subject, or who want minute criticism of this or that aspect or problem of life. We, for instance, think the scaffold a very excellent thing, and only regret that certain persons whom we could name, have not yet figured on it. Hugo, in theory at least, would not have liked to send to it even those altogether unimaginable scoundrels (there is another poem, more's the pity, about them here) who threw handfuls of stones at his windows in Belgium. But all's one for that. He begins with no extraordinary felicity—

Aie une muse belluaire—

Les révolutions, ces grandes affranchies,
Sont farouches, étant filles des monarchies;

Turn the page, and you come to this tirade about Marat:—

Il souffle la fureur, les griefs acharnés,
La vengeance, la mort, la vie aux déchaînés;
A plat ventre, grinçant des dents, livide, oblique,
Il travaille à l'immense évasion publique;
Il perce l'épais mur du bagne, et, dans son trou,
Du grand cachot de l'ombre il tire le verrou;
Il saisit l'ancien monde, il met à nu sa plaie;
Il le traîne de rue en rue, il est la claie;
Il est en même temps la huée; il écrit,
Le vent d'orage emporte et sème son esprit,
Une feuille, de fange et d'aurore inondée,
Espèce de guenille horrible de l'idée.
Il dénonce, il délivre; il console, il maudit;
De la liberté sainte il est l'âpre bandit;
Il agite l'antique et monstrueuse chaîne,
Hideux, faisant sonner le fer contre sa haine;
On voit autour de lui des ossements humains.
Charlotte, ayant le cœur des ancêtres romains,
Seule osera tenter cet antre inabordable.
Il est le misérable, il est le formidable;
Il est l'auguste infâme; il est le nain géant;
Il égorge, massacre, extermine, en créant;
Un pauvre en deuil l'émeut, un roi saignant le charme;
Sa fureur aime; il verse une effroyable larme;
Comme il pleure avec rage au secours des souffrants!
Il crie au mourant: Tue! il crie au volé: Prends!
Il crie à l'opprimé: Foule aux pieds! broie! accable!
Doux pour une détresse et pour l'autre implacable,
Il fait à cette foule, à cette nation,
A ce peuple, un salut d'extermination.
Dur, mais grand; front livide entre les fronts célèbres!
Ténébreux, il attaque et détruit les ténèbres.
Cette chauve-souris fait la guerre au corbeau.
Prêtre imposteur du vrai, difforme amant du beau,
Il combat l'ombre avec toutes les armes noires.
Pierres, boue et crachats, affronts, cris dérisoires,
Hymnes à l'échafaud, poignard, rire infernal,
Il puise à pleines mains dans l'affreux arsenal;
Cet homme peut toucher à tout, hors à la foudre.

That is Hugo, parti. Perhaps nobody will ever go to the passage for an exceedingly accurate historical description of the "verminous fellow" who is its hero; perhaps a good deal of it would be hard to make out or to support; perhaps some of it is very nearly silly. But that is not the point. The point is the perfect mastery of the poet over the form and medium (rebellious enough, Heaven and readers of the classical drama know). When in the palace-prison of Rueil, D'Artagnan, the wise and valiant, meditated escape by dint of the strength of Porthos, that prudent Gascon thought it well to make actual experiment on the state of his friend's muscles. "Make me," said he, "a hoop of the tongs and a corkscrew of the poker"; and Porthos did it. In the same way Hugo will make of the stiff, the correct, the monotonous (as some say) Alexandrine any object you will, or rather any that he will himself, for he is not good at working to order. The verse takes just the cadence, just the tone, that is asked of it; it will hiss, roar, laugh, whisper, coo, just exactly as the poet chooses. It is most at home, no doubt, in the tirades just quoted—things which have always had a remarkable affinity for the French genius—but it is by no means only at home there. And both in it and in those modifications of it which he used for lyrical purposes the power of sound, on the one hand, and the skilful reliance on those "great commonplaces" noted above, are certain to produce the effect, to raise the temperature of the reader sooner or later to the true Hugonian heat, which marks a formidable number of degrees on the poetical thermometer. And so we go on, often through the good, here and there through the bad ("Bourgeois parlant de Jésus Christ," for instance, reads like a tedious and infelicitous sketch for the famous passage in the Contemplations), sometimes through the indifferent, but never through the unpoetical. One may take examples almost at random. "Le Cheik et le voleur," an unreasonable delightful study of the Légende kind; "Quand la lune apparaît dans la brume des plaines" (the first line of a poem of Hugo's is to the instructed something like the title of a picture by a well-known master—he knows generally what it will be like, not particularly how good it will be); a denunciation, sensible and phonetically ingenious, of "titotleures"—of course quite wrongly explained in a note; and then such an admirable snatch as this:—

Ces mots de l'océan qui tout, terreur et grâce,
Cieux, mers, escarpement devant tout ce qui passe,
Bruit sombre qui parfois semble un hymne béni,
Patience à porter le poids de l'infini;
Et, dans ces fiers déserts qu'un ordre effrayant règle,
On se sent croître une aile, et l'âme devient aigle.

This note, which dominates during the greater part of the first volume, will, as we have hinted, recall the Contemplations; and, indeed, perhaps the largest part of both is of this style. The first ends appropriately with the grave, noble, and, for the writer, most happily unegotistic funeral poem on Théophile Gautier. The verum and bonum could hardly be more happily summed up in this case than by one line—

Va chercher le vrai, toi qui sus trouver le beau.

The second volume is somewhat the more varied of the two. We meet, of course, the respected Georges and Jeanne, whom, without the smallest intention of impoliteness to a young gentleman, and still less to a young lady, we could spare; but we meet other things, too. Here is a pretty junction of Victor and Voiture:—

La mort et la beauté sont deux choses profondes
Qui contiennent tant d'ombre et d'azur qu'on dirait
Deux sœurs également terribles et fécondes,
Ayant la même énigme et le même secret.

O femmes, voix, regards, cheveux noirs, tresses blondes,
Brillez, je meurs! ayez l'éclat, l'amour, l'attrait,
O perles que la mer mêle à ses grandes ondes,
O lumineux oiseaux de la sombre forêt!

Judith, nos deux destins sont plus près l'un de l'autre
Qu'on ne croirait, à voir mon visage et le vôtre;
Tout le divin abîme apparaît dans vos yeux,

Et moi, je sens le gouffre étoilé dans mon âme;
Nous sommes tous les deux voisins du ciel, madame,
Puisque vous êtes belle et puisque je suis vieux.

And with what joy does the enraptured reader meet the page which introduces him, as it were, to full 1830:—

Sitôt qu'Aminte fut venue
Nue,
Devant le dey qui lui semblait
Laid.

And this again:—

Guy, mon père,
N'use point
A rien faire
Son pourpoint,
Pas de fête
Qu'il n'apprête,
Casque en tête,
Dague au poing.

"Hermina," "Ce que Gemma pense d'Emma," and others in the same neighbourhood, are so agreeable that we are not very angry when the great man, in a pleasing poem on "Le Rat," pities that animal for having to gnaw the works of M. de Pontmartin, or when he indites a solemn, and not particularly impressive, piece on the well-deserved fate of those scoundrels who were hanged at Manchester twenty-one years ago, or when he informs "un Roi de troisième ordre," the King of the Belgians, with elaboration unfortunately manifesting a state of mind rather different from that boasted of, that "peu m'importe," that "tu" (the poor third-rate King) "m'as expulsé," that "je ne te réponds pas" (except in three pages of Alexandrines about bave, cloporte, and so forth). For we do not go to Victor Hugo for politics, or for philosophy, or for erudition, or even for sense. We go to him for poetry; and we get it.

THE GOLFING ANNUAL.*

GOLF is a very humane game in the sense in which literæ are called humanæ. There is a great deal of human nature in the golfer. He loves a joke and a song, and a harmless personal joke. The cricketer is more serious. There is no humour in Lillywhite's Cricketer's Annual. It is a stern record of events; the writers but seldom drop into poetry. The difficulty is to keep the golfer confined to prose. There have been golfing epic poems ever since the Forty-five. Can the Caledonian Muse be more herself than in a screed like this?—

The turf is soft as maiden's cheek,
Wi' youth and beauty bloomin',
And bonnie thyme wi' odour sweet
The caller air's perfumin'.

These lines are by Thomson, not Jamie, but John, of the Glasgow Golf Club. As far as they are here quoted, they speak only of the golfer's enjoyment of nature. By "maiden's cheek" the author, perhaps, means the audacious conduct of young ladies who join in a Foursome on the course at St. Andrews. The social consequences of such a Foursome are fearsome. We cannot apologize to golfers for the remark, because their Annual contains the observation that "Ananias lay dead, after a bad lie." Yet it is said that the Scotch have no sense of humour. Among the golfing poets Mr. Thomson is remarkable for keeping clear of golf:—

There's heights and howes, there's bosky knowes,
As far as eye can cover;
By sea and land a prospect grand
Dame Nature shows her lover.

Homme de bien qui voyez tant de choses,
Voyez-vous point—

a little golfing? one feels inclined to ask the minstrel.

There's cleeks and clubs; there's washing-tubs,
To hitch into a rhymie;
There's codes and laws, and some hae cause
To write for hours on Stymie, seems a verse more germane to the matter when we have read Sir Walter Simpson's introductory treatise on the Laws of Golf. These laws were expected to be brought down from the high hole by the President of the St. Andrews Club, and to be accepted by all the new clubs of golfers in England. But St. Andrews, it seems, is less legislative than the M.C.C., and the rules which suit one links do not suit all others. Rabbit-holes, burns, bunkers, Mrs. Forman's garden, washing-tubs, the sea, the Eden, and a number of local hazards and peculiarities cause the rules of golf to be more or less a collection of local customs. Hence a prodigiously long correspondence in the Field, reprinted in the Annual with Sir Walter Simpson's summing up. If there are clubs which "will not accept the rules as printed at St. Andrews," let them be Anathema. Roma locuta est. People who do not listen are no better than Irish bishops, and may form a number of dissenting and schismatic bodies; but we cannot here enter into the topic of their differences—it would weary an ecclesiastical historian. It seems quite right, however, that a player who does not hole out his ball in Medal-play should receive "two strokes" (inflicted in public, we presume), or be disqualified, as at Wimbledon.

The best paper in the book is Mr. Horace Hutchinson's account of a match on several English links between himself and a "pawky" player. Mr. Hutchinson says the match was halved, which is probably due to his modesty. But the differences between his game and that of an amateur, whom we believe capable of using a driving putter, enable him to describe various English links as they suit various styles of play. "Far and sure" is the true golfer's motto; the adversary in this sketch was "sure" without being "far." This gave him an advantage at Wimbledon. Lord Scamperdale wished that Mr. Sponge might be condemned to hunt in Berwickshire for the term of his natural life. We wish no worse to any foe than that he should be condemned for life to hunt balls in the whins of Wimbledon. Sandless, burnless, bunkerless, Wimbledon is the golfer's Inferno, and a man of principle would almost as soon play at Hawick or on Primrose Hill. Even Blackheath, though more cramped, is also more historical and interesting as the home of the oldest extant club. On the other hand, the club-house at Wimbledon would be a joy in itself, even if there were no "links," if that august word may be applied to the common, with its narrow stretches of turf running through hedges of whins. As Mr. Hutchinson remarks, all golf-links are hard to get at. St. Andrews is nearly impossible; but, when once reached, why should anybody ever leave it? Felixstowe appears to be penitus divisus orbe. Of Bembridge it is written—and it might be written of Ballantrae—that "there is very good golf, what there is of it; but there is not enough." The beginner may do worse than try Ballantrae; he certainly will not be crowded; the links have been extended, the scenery is all Mr. John Thomson could desire, and the course is a real golfing course—what there is of it. It will not, however, suit the duffer, concerning whom Mr. John Thomson, doffing his singing robes, writes very agreeably in plain prose. We would not speak evil of duffers; as Marcus Aurelius says, it takes all sorts to make a world; and, as long as the duffer is modest and unambitious, and only plays with—professors, why he does no harm. When once he fancies himself, and tries to get into matches with third-rate performers, then, of course, he becomes a nuisance. But there is a great deal of the unexpected—nay, of the bizarre—in the duffer's play which lends it interest. A duffer once found out, by a prodigious swipe in an unlooked-for direction, a new way of negotiating the high hole at St. Andrews. It is true that he also nearly killed a respectable but unimaginative player, who had not supposed that a golf ball could come in that direction.

It is pleasant to find that Mr. Horace Hutchinson believes in St. Andrews as "the finest green in the whole wide world." His article on this centre of the universe is amusingly illustrated by the author in the manner of Tommaseo Traddles. Mr. Hutchinson's anecdotes are good and new, or as good as new, which is rare in golfing circles. When the Editor himself drops into poetry we would remind him that neither "wean," "brain," "stane," "gane," nor "ain," rhymes to "game," even in Scotch. The technical information about local clubs is good and in prose. The Golfing Annual is a useful book and amusing—to a golfer.

THE HENRY IRVING SHAKESPEARE.*

NOW that the theatre enjoys unexampled popularity, and Shakespeare is by no means banished from the stage, an edition of Shakespeare that supplies a good résumé of the stage history of the plays is a distinct boon to all classes of playgoers. This feature of The Henry Irving Shakespeare is, of course, peculiarly appropriate, and constitutes, we think, no small proportion of its claim to popularity. The annals of the theatre are scattered over a vast range of literature, and are for most people practically inaccessible. It is an obvious gain, therefore, to have chronicled in brief the history of each play—both from the literary and the stage standpoint—the vicissitudes of each play, the first appearance of great actors in famous parts, the various acting versions and their quality, and other matters that pertain to the fortunes of Shakspearian drama in the hands of managers and actors. Another very useful characteristic of this edition is the expository comment on the dramatis personæ, which includes much information relative to historical personages drawn from chroniclers and antiquarians. Minor points of interest are the illustrative maps, the tables of words peculiar to each play, and the various emendations adopted or suggested. These last, it is satisfactory to find, are extremely infrequent. The present volume comprises Richard III.—which Mr. Marshall introduces with some pertinent remarks on the textual authority of the First Quarto and the First Folio—and King John, The Merchant of Venice, and Henry IV., Parts I. and II., plays that are assumed to belong to "what is generally called," to quote Mr. Marshall, "Shakespeare's second period." The annotation is somewhat more copious than that of the preceding volumes, owing to the variant readings in Richard III. of the Quarto and the Folio, which the scrupulous editor records. The list of these (p. 117), though but a gathering of the less important in a single scene (Sc. 2, Act. III.), is appalling to look at; but examination speedily dissipates the terror of it. Not a few are extremely slight, mere errors of transcription in fact, to be debited to Quarto or Folio as the student may incline. On the question of textual authority Mr. Marshall observes, with excellent discretion, "It is much easier to find fault with the theories of others than to propound any more satisfactory theory one's self." In the Henry Irving Shakespeare the text of Richard III. is based on the First Folio, and Mr. Marshall's reasons for dissenting from the example of the Cambridge edition seem to us to be plausible. For the rest, the footnotes, explanatory as they are for the most part of obsolete or unusual terms, are of the right kind; and the indications of "cuts" in the text for stage representation are interesting and may prove serviceable.

FRENCH LITERATURE.

M. WELSCHINGER'S volume on the last scion of the great house of Condé (1) is very full, elaborate, and careful, and in particular contains the best account in abstract, and not brief abstract, known to us of the fortunes of the ill-fated and much-abused emigrant army. As to the final tragedy (a word here, if anywhere, in place) M. Welschinger has naturally much to say as to the recent attempts of M. Boulay de la Meurthe to shift the blame off Napoleon's shoulders. He would be stronger here if he did not himself make a disproportionate and unfounded attack on Talleyrand. There is probably no crime (except ill-breeding and stupidity) of which Talleyrand was not capable; but there is no evidence worth a rush to show that he had anything more to do with this crime than arranging and defending, in the ordinary "F. O." way of business, the Ettenheim kidnapping—which, but for the bloodshed that followed, would only have been a piece of scandalous insolence. Napoleon was the only person who could gain by the murder, was quite villain enough to commit it, and was not such a fool as to be guided by others in the commission.

The race of French Anglophobes enragés in the special matter of India is well known, and we do not know that, except from a faithful chronicler of new books—such as they are and whatever they are—a new addition (2) to the list has much claim to notice. Hadji Mirza, of whose allegiance to the Prophet we rather doubt, has got together some scandals about English administration, has composed some dialogues between supposed Afghan and Indian persons as to the Grand Padisha Blanc, and has said some ill-natured things about our recent Afghan campaigns, about which it is not difficult to say ill-natured things. That is about all.

The eleventh edition generally, not always, speaks for itself. In the case of Eugène's French Grammar (London: Williams & Norgate), the feather in the cap is a by no means ill-deserved feather.

Baron Ernouf's book (3) on Beethoven, Rossini, Meyerbeer, Mendelssohn, and Schumann may lend itself to more extended notice later; at present we only note its appearance.

Schopenhauer's famous book has found, we think, more than one French translator before M. Burdeau (4). The present is a strict translation without introductions or any editorial matter; but it appears, so far as we have examined it, to be reasonably good of its kind.

M. Rameau talks some nonsense in his book of verse (5), especially about the death of old gods, &c. But who shall be pardoned nonsense if not a writer of verse? And there is about his book a certain souffle which, we own, reconciles us to a good deal of extravagance and verbosity here and there. Besides M. Rameau can write "straight from the shoulder" when he chooses, and, above all, he has one saving grace which in these days atones for almost anything, and is more rarely found than any other. There is no Katzenjammer about him, no disillusion, no cross-grained, or more probably thin-blooded, quarrelling with the good things of this life. It appears that he would often like "more of them," is sometimes conscious of not being able to enjoy them as much as they deserve, and now and then feels the shadow of their coming loss. But these things are what the good people feel, and are quite different from the stale and graceless cant of névrose and pessimism.

M. Gauthier's translations from Poushkin (6) require less notice as not being original. There is some prose as well as some verse in them, and both are well done.

We have before now noticed M. Carcassonne's sometimes capital collection of "Pièces à dire." Here is a third volume of them (7), as well fitted for their purpose, and showing as happy an adaptability of talent in the author as ever.

The four collections of tales before us are all up to or above the average in their different ways. M. Bonnetain's Amours nomades (8), as might be expected from that misguided person, is a mixture of what the outspoken last century would have called cochonneries, of risky but pardonable farcicalities, and of sketches and impression-pieces, showing so much talent that one wonders why on earth the author should hang up forbidden fruit, and such dirty forbidden fruit, too, in his shop. "Nostalgies," "La servante," "En mer," "Ben Guignon," and others are admirable, and show the talent which the author has been gifted with; instead of which he goes about the country writing what it is unnecessary to mention. "La dernière heure" is far, far from proper, but it is such an audacious skit on L'Abbesse de Jouarre (it is addressed to M. Renan), and is so funny in itself, that we admit "circ. att." The charm of M. Wulff's book (9) lies in a singular naïveté. The hero of the first tale is a mixture of D'Artagnan and Harry Sandford, which will be admitted to be an interesting mixture. M. Gauthiez (10), who is a sculptor and a poet, if only a minor poet, as well as a tale-teller, is rather fond of tragic subjects, and his first story is not (if the shade of the Rev. H. Tilney will pardon us) "nice" in some ways, but he writes and tells well. The title story of Mme. Mairet's book (11) we have seen (and we think noticed) before; it has, as have the others, merit.

NEW BOOKS AND REPRINTS.

THERE appears to be an increasing number of well-intentioned persons bent on promoting a friendly understanding between science and religion by the tedious and unoriginal channel of book-making. Most of these writers needlessly admit—like the anonymous author of The Immorality of Idolatry (Ridgway) the influence of Professor Henry Drummond. In this instance we have to deal only with the preliminary section of a work yet unpublished, and may resignedly await its completion. There is nothing to do but to recognize its promise. Manly self-confidence and a robust sense of universal error in the theological world are its pleasing qualities. There is, we are assured, no conflict between religion and science. The discord that troubles so many earnest souls is between modern science and the erroneous theology which the Church has built up on a mistaken interpretation of Scripture. The war is between what the author calls scientific theology and scholastic or artificial theology, which is idolatry. Problems that have engaged the acutest intellects of the Church of England are mere child's play to the author. He finds nothing transcendental in the doctrine of the Trinity (p. 65), and is evidently surprised that Coleridge, for instance, should not, like himself, discover the truth of that doctrine to be "axiomatic and self-evident." Scholastic theology must give way to scientific theology, and this is to be effected by an improvement upon Mr. Froude's suggestion that "the laity, who are neither divines nor philosophers," should "take the matter into their own hands." In a word, laymen must study theology for themselves and teach their children the truth. These children are to be the clergy of the future. Then will commence the mild reign of scientific theology, and the "graven images" of Anglican theology will be for ever shattered.

To turn from this pretty prospect of confusion worse confounded to Mr. S. B. G. McKinney's candid though diffuse outpourings—The Science and Art of Religion (Kegan Paul, Trench, & Co.)—is almost a pleasure, so keen is the sense of relief. Mr. McKinney goes for modern science with a healthy alacrity that is refreshing, if not convincing. He lays about him with charming impartiality. He ranges up and down the fields of controversy, religious and scientific, clothed with impenetrable assurance. The folly of Darwin is an open book for him, and Colenso on the Pentateuch is no stumbling-block. Both writers, he thinks, were afflicted with theories founded on "ignorance and self-conceit."

Professor Blackie's Life of Burns (Walter Scott) is in no sense a remarkable acquisition to the "Great Writers" series. It is, on the whole, an average example, if we accept the author's view that there was not much to be done with the subject. His aim was to make a judicious selection from existing materials, and to pronounce an equitable judgment on the poet and his work. Something more than this pertains to the biographical ideal. Most people who love Burns will be surprised to read of him as a "preacher of righteousness to the youth of his country," and will be supremely indifferent anent Professor Blackie's discovery that he was gifted with a "special mission," his mission in life being to "elevate, enlarge, put a classical stamp on, and give a world-wide celebrity to Scottish song." The supremely delightful thing about Burns is that there is nothing in his poetry or his letters of the man with a mission.

Real People (Sampson Low & Co.) is the title of half a dozen sketches of American life and character written by Marion Wilcox, Counselor at Law. They are fresh, discriminating, somewhat smart, and deftly handled. Altogether, there is good reading in the book for the jaded. In "A Spanish-American Engagement" we have a vivacious picture of a Spanish household in America, where "the beds are always in a muss, being used as lounges and catch-alls." The description of the slovenly house is enough to give one an energy fit. Another bright sketch is devoted to an account of the production of Parsifal at Bayreuth, diversified by brief entr'acte dialogue between two Chicago lovers. On their return, weary and silent, to their lodgings, she asks him, "What do you suppose I've been thinking?" and he, fearing she would be shocked to know his own mundane contemplations, replied briskly, "Motives, and themes, and orchestration, and that sort of thing?" "No, my dear; I was thinking that we should furnish the north room—at home, you know—in red." This feminine candour almost obliterates the delicate satire.

Mr. Hamilton Clarke's short stories—Two Chorus Girls; and other Stories (Swan Sonnenschein & Co.)—deal chiefly with theatrical and military experiences, and are pleasantly written, though of the slightest possible texture. "The Old Drummer" is a life-like sketch of the vicissitudes that sometimes attend the orchestral performer. But why does Mr. Clarke think it at all notable that a man "somewhat past middle age" should be the "father of a lovely girl of sixteen"? and why does he designate soldiers on horseback as "of the cavalry persuasion"?

Deep and endless are the woes of the taxpayer, it is generally admitted, yet the most confirmed grumbler may be stirred to fresh discontent by the feeling criticism of "Finance" in an elaborate pamphlet entitled The British Taxpayer and his Wrongs (Effingham Wilson). This is a readable contribution to the chaotic literature on equitable taxation. We may notice here a translation of Professor Luigi Cossa's treatise Scienza delle Finanze, edited by Mr. Horace White—Taxation; its Principles and Methods (Putnam's Sons)—which is rendered by various hands. To this essay on the theory of taxation is appended a note on the State tax system of Pennsylvania and New York.

Mr. Alexander Skene Smith's Holiday Recreations (Chapman & Hall) is a volume of verse, for the most part of the album order, solely remarkable for the extremely good-natured preface of the Rev. Principal Cairns, in which the obligations of friendship are frankly admitted.

A Manual of Church History in two small volumes (Hodder & Stoughton) is a fairly skilful summary, with useful marginal index and tables of dates, written by the Rev. A. C. Jennings.

We have received a new edition of The Renaissance: Studies in Art and Poetry, by Walter Pater (Macmillan & Co.); M. Léon Say's Turgot, translated by M. Gustave Masson (Routledge); Of the Imitation of Christ, a new "revised" edition (S.P.C.K.); Richard Lepsius, a biography, from the German of Georg Ebers, by Zoe Dana Underhill (New York: Gottsberger; London: Trübner); Sermons, by Canon Liddon, "Contemporary Pulpit Library" (Swan Sonnenschein & Co.); Hymns: and other Verses, by Canon Baynes (Sampson Low & Co.); A Vision of Martyrs, by James Bownes, M.A. (Masters & Co.); and Platina's Lives of the Popes, edited by the Rev. W. Benham, a reproduction of the version issued by Sir Paul Rycaut in 1685 (Griffith, Farran, & Co.)

We have also received Low's Handbook to the Charities of London, 1888, the fifty-first annual issue of this useful manual (Sampson Low & Co.); Ireland—Past and Present, by Henry Norton Palmer (Exeter: Eland); The Arab in Central Asia, by James Stevenson, F.R.S.E. (Glasgow: Maclehose); A Royal Cure for Ireland's Ills (Edinburgh: Paterson); Part III. of the Cyclopædia of Education (Swan Sonnenschein); the Evening School Chronicle, No. 4, the organ of the Recreative Evening Schools Association (Griffith, Farran, & Co.); Technical Education, a tract (No. 3), by James A. Newbold (Heywood); and How to Spell and Speak English, by "M.A. Cantab." (Rolf Brothers).

We have received from the Countess Agénor de Gasparin a letter stating that she is "contrainte à répudier publiquement toute connection avec le livre intitulé" Sunny Fields and Shady Woods recently published under her name and noticed in the Saturday Review of June 2.

HISTORICAL REVIEW of the LEGISLATIVE SYSTEMS OPERATIVE in IRELAND from the INVASION of HENRY II. to the UNION (1172–1800).

By the Right Hon. J. T. BALL, LL.D., D.C.L. 8vo. 6s.

"There are few sounder authorities on the constitutional history of Ireland than Dr. Ball, and this concise treatise is admirably lucid and written in a thoroughly judicial spirit........The author traces the rise, progress, and influences of Irish Parliamentary institutions till they were merged in those of the United Kingdom by the Act of Union, and we may say at once that he proves indirectly through every chapter that the Union realized all legitimate patriotic aspirations, as it prepared the way for the generous redressing of the grievances of which the Irish had good reason to complain."—Times.

London: LONGMANS, GREEN, & CO.

NEW NOVEL BY OSWALD CRAWFURD,

Author of "Beyond the Seas" &c.

SYLVIA ARDEN.

1 vol. crown 8vo. 6s.

From the ACADEMY.

We do not think Mr. Oswald Crawfurd has ever done anything so good of its kind as "Sylvia Arden." It is full of hairbreadth 'scapes from imminent deadly Greeks and others, pilots the hero through them with speed and skill, and comes to a satisfactory and striking end."

From the WORLD.

"Is Saul also among the prophets?" Is Mr. Oswald Crawfurd to be numbered among the sensational novelists? It would certainly seem so, judging from his latest production, "Sylvia Arden," and in common fairness we must congratulate him on the success of his first venture in the new style. Written, of course, with much more grace and delicacy than the ordinary "shilling shocker," Mr. Crawfurd's story is full of interest and excitement, and fulfils its raison d'être by holding the breathless attention of the reader from first to last.

From the SCOTSMAN.

Mr. Oswald Crawfurd's new story, "Sylvia Arden," is a weird and powerful romance of the imagination. It is so cleverly constructed as to sustain at an even level a strong interest roused almost from the beginning. Part of this effect is due, it may be, less to the story in itself than to the steadily maintained interest of Mr. Crawfurd's narrative style—good, nervous prose, instinct with simplicity and strength.

BY THOMAS HARDY.

Wessex Tales: Strange, Lively, and Commonplace. By THOMAS HARDY, Author of "The Woodlanders," "Far from the Madding Crowd," &c. 2 vols. Globe 8vo. 12s.

"These idylls of West Country Life," says the Times, "will rank among the truest things the novelist of the yeomen, the shepherds, and the woodlanders has given us."

BY W. E. NORRIS.

Chris. By W. E. NORRIS, Author of "My Friend Jim," "Mademoiselle de Mersac," &c. 2 vols. Crown 8vo. 21s.

"In Mr. Norris," says the Times, "the minor virtues have found a polished exponent and the minor vices an amusing satirist........Concerning 'Chris' as a story we have little else to say but to predict that it will be no less successful than its predecessors."

"It is an undeniable fact," says the Academy, "that 'Chris' was decidedly unconventional. It is equally undeniable that she was decidedly charming."

"All that Mr. Norris writes," says the Guardian, "is clever, and 'Chris' makes no exception to the rule. It is a bright story, carefully wrought, full of point and subtlety, and with a good variety of sharply-cut characters."

THE EMPEROR FREDERICK.

THE days of the Emperor FREDERICK's reign have been few and evil. The hopes raised by the unexpected strength he showed during, and for some time after, his journey to Berlin have proved groundless, and the second Emperor of GERMANY has followed his father after a reign of a few months. Short as his time has been it has been long enough to enable him to prove on the Throne that he possessed many of the qualities of his House. Some doubt will always exist as to his real character and his faculty for rule. As Crown Prince he kept himself, with the exception of one unsuccessful and somewhat ill-timed interference in politics, carefully in the background. His reign has not been long enough to test his capacity fully. Yet, in spite of his retired life and the briefness of his period of rule, he persuaded all men that he had governing faculty and very definite opinions. Of his personal courage and devotion to duty there never was any doubt. Both have been tried by the most cruel tests and have borne them admirably.

The birth of the late EMPEROR took place at Berlin on the 19th of October, 1831, at a time when his father was still, and was to be for years, only Heir Apparent to the Throne and one of the most zealous of the generals of the Prussian army. Prince FREDERICK received the education of a HOHENZOLLERN prince—a great deal of drill, and a slight tincture of letters. In this latter part of his training he may have owed something to his mother, a princess of the family of Sachs-Weimar, which has always patronized literature, but his uncle's Court would have supplied him with the same influence. He had already attained to the age fixed for the majority of men of his family when the revolutionary troubles of 1848 broke out. This was one of the few periods in its history in which the head of the Prussian Royal House showed neither courage nor wisdom nor dignity. The KING was cowed by the Berlin mob, and Prince FREDERICK's father was compelled to go into exile. It would appear from one passage in his life that the spectacle of popular disorder had a deep influence on the PRINCE; but he took no part in public affairs then or for years afterwards. Until 1858 he was engaged in training himself for his duty by study, travel, and by steady attention to his work as an officer. In January of this year he was married to the PRINCESS ROYAL of England—a union which renewed an old connexion between the families. For five years the PRINCE continued to lead a life of industry and domestic happiness. The death of his uncle in 1861 had raised his father to the throne, and himself to the rank of Crown Prince. It is well known that his father's accession to the throne was briefly followed by a violent constitutional conflict at Berlin. King WILLIAM, strange as it sounds now, had been a "Liberal" Heir Apparent. As King, however, he soon showed that he wore his sword with his Liberalism. His choice of Herr VON BISMARCK as Prime Minister, and his resolution in supporting the Premier's policy, brought on a prolonged struggle between KING and Parliament. In 1863 the CROWN PRINCE intervened in the dispute with the one political manifesto which he ever permitted himself to make. During a tour of military inspection he made a speech at Dantzig in answer to an address from the Burgomaster, and openly expressed his disapproval of some high-handed measures of Prince BISMARCK's. He also recorded a protest against them in a more formal way, basing his right to do so on the fact that he was the future head of his House, and therefore entitled to express an opinion on a policy which seemed not unlikely to endanger its position. The natural tendency of the Heir Apparent to oppose the King is sufficient explanation of the PRINCE's action. His father had acted not very differently towards his uncle. Prince FREDERICK, however, acted on the tradition of Royal houses on this occasion only. The answer he received convinced him that no opposition to the Royal will would be tolerated. Perhaps he reflected that family dissensions were as dangerous as an unpopular policy. In any case he accepted the position with good sense and dignity, nor did he ever again attempt to speak for himself on questions of policy. His activity for the rest of his life, until his late accession, was confined to the discharge of his duty as a soldier.

The course of events was destined to give him abundance of occupation in this, the most important, part of the duties of a Prussian Prince. During the preparatory little war in Schleswig-Holstein he occupied only a diplomatic post on the staff of Field Marshal VON WRANGEL, and was mainly engaged in preventing quarrels between the Prussian and Austrian commanders. In the great war of 1866 his share was conspicuous. When the armies were organized for the field he was appointed to the command of the second, or army of Silesia, a force of 115,000 men. During the dangerous concentric march of the three Prussian armies into Bohemia, the PRINCE had some serious fighting to do, and extricated himself with credit. It was the timely arrival of his army at Culm, on the right of the Austrians, which decided the battle. He was rewarded on the field itself by his father, who put his own collar of the order of merit round his son's neck. Another and a greater war followed. During the invasion of France in 1870 Prince FREDERICK commanded on the left of the German line, which formed the van in the advance. His army began the fighting in Alsace by the defeat of Marshal MACMAHON at Woerth on the 7th of August. While the other German corps were driving the French back from Spicheren to Metz, and shutting BAZAINE up in that fortress, the PRINCE was advancing in a parallel line through the Alsatian hills. When it was at last known that the only remaining French army capable of manœuvring was committed to a desperate attempt to reach BAZAINE from the North, the Germans executed the great circular movement to the right which enabled them to pin the EMPEROR against the Belgian frontier and crush him at Sedan. His position in the line required the PRINCE to make a long march; but he executed his share of the work as punctually as he had done in 1866. His army took its part in the decisive battle of the war. During the rest of the struggle he was always well in front. He covered the siege of Paris, and had at least the general direction of the operations which finally annihilated the army of the Loire. When the Princes offered that crown of Germany which had been once before offered to a Prussian king by a revolutionary assembly, and refused, to King WILLIAM, the CROWN PRINCE was the first who did homage to the new sovereign. His prominence on the occasion was his right by service as well as by birth. Whether his campaigns may be taken to prove that the late EMPEROR was a great, or even a very able, soldier may be a matter of opinion. He had always the assistance of a chief of the staff who was one of the best officers in the German army. Certainly nothing the Emperor FREDERICK ever said showed that war acted on him as a stimulant as it did on his father. He was not the man to publish such a vehement piece of praise of the joys of battle as that letter to the Alsatians by which the late Marshal MANTEUFFEL horrified the sentimentalists of Europe. Nobody thought of him as, in the first place, a soldier, as they thought of his cousin FREDERICK CHARLES. Still less was he suspected of a taste for war, such as some profess to find in his son and successor. But if the EMPEROR looked upon war as really, and not only by a figure of speech, a sad necessity, he faced it resolutely, accepting soldiering as part of his work as a prince and doing it punctually. He must have been ready to take good advice, and he was certainly magnanimous in acknowledging and rewarding the services rendered him. An intercepted letter of General BLUMENTHAL'S shows that this officer could criticize his chief sharply enough. The EMPEROR must have heard of or seen the letter; but one of the first acts of his reign was to promote his old chief of the staff to the rank of Field Marshal, and to send him his own bâton. The incident may fairly be taken to prove that General BLUMENTHAL wrote nothing which his future sovereign was not ready to hear from him. No higher praise could well be given to a Prince who was not by nature a general than that he recognized the fact and took the best means to make good his deficiency.

With the return of peace the CROWN PRINCE fell back into modest subordination to his father. He was commonly said not to approve of the policy of Prince BISMARCK in all respects, but he was never known to express an opinion which had even a distant appearance of opposition. Though it was taken for granted that he would rule for himself when he came to the throne, no man expected that he would try to forestall his time. There is no need to say what has been the end of these hopes and expectations. For months the EMPEROR has been the object of anxious and melancholy attention in Europe while he was struggling for life. It would be idle to inquire what has been the character of a reign which has lasted for so short a time. The utmost that can be said of it is that it gave promise of what it might have been. To judge from what few indications there are we may conclude that the Emperor FREDERICK'S policy would not have differed materially from his father's. His letter to Prince BISMARCK, his proclamation to the Reichstag, if it is to be called by this name, and some more recent incidents, show that, whatever his Liberalism may have been in earlier times, it had not finally persuaded him to accept the position of a sovereign who reigns but who does not govern. He placed the rights of his house on a level with, and the interests of the Empire above, the Constitution which he swore to maintain. In practice this would have meant that he reserved to himself the right of deciding on all questions of policy in the last resort. Much would have depended on the particular course he preferred; but here again there were not wanting signs that he was resolved to follow his father's example in the most essential feature. The brief history of his rule shows that he was in no way disposed to part with Prince BISMARCK. The EMPEROR'S life has been a very exceptional one. There have been reigns as brief as his, but they have generally been the reigns of children. It would not be easy to find another example of a ruler who, coming to the throne in the maturity of life, has passed from it so rapidly. The reputation of the EMPEROR was also exceptional, for, without ever having done anything which could be said to show great power of intellect, he had convinced the world of his faculty for rule. There was a universal belief in the quiet strength of his character. The future may briefly show whether Germany has cause to lament that his place is taken by a younger ruler.

ENGLAND AND THE EAST.

THE alarming condition of the German EMPEROR has probably diverted attention a little from the change which took place in Egypt at the end of last week. The substitution of RIAZ PASHA for NUBAR PASHA as the KHEDIVE'S Prime Minister, has not at the present moment the importance which it would have had some years ago; but it is still a matter of considerable interest. Of the three politicians who were for so long competitors for and alternate possessors of power in Egypt, RIAZ has had, to say the least, not the worst repute for ability and honesty. But it may be admitted at once by the most strenuous upholders of the maintenance of English control over Egypt, that during that control the situation of an Egyptian Prime Minister is anything but an easy one, and that if he be a man at once honest, patriotic, and possessing some will of his own, he is very likely to come into collision with the irregular and indefinable authority established above, behind, beside (or whatever preposition is preferred) his nominal master. The greater suppleness of NUBAR has made him, on the whole, the most convenient occupier of this difficult post. But it need hardly be said that suppleness, especially in an Oriental, has [illegible] and complementary disadvantages. The same qualities which make a man a complaisant instrument constantly make him a very doubtfully faithful one. We shall say nothing more against NUBAR PASHA than that his critics have always been most unjust to him if he is a politician of rigid and Quixotic constancy and frankness. RIAZ, on the other hand, has a much better record in these respects; and though he is said to be opinionated and narrow, there seems to be but little reason for fearing—as some have affected to fear—that he will be found to be a difficulty, either as being impracticable in his relations with the English representative, or as lending himself to foreign intrigue, or (the point most feared) as giving unwise assistance to the natural but unreasonable and impossible desires of the Porte for a larger share of influence in Egypt than that sublime but somewhat decayed Power at present possesses.

Even if there were more danger than there is of any of these results, there is no reason for apprehending inability on the part of our representative in Egypt to deal with them. It has not been possible, especially in the earlier part of his proceedings, invariably to approve the conduct of Sir EVELYN BARING; and it is to be feared that historians will assign to the mistaken ideas with which he took up his post, and to his endeavour to carry them out, some, at least, of the ghastly disgraces and blunders which marked the earlier years of our Egyptian occupation. He is also accused, rightly or wrongly, of being somewhat difficile à vivre, politically speaking. But in the later and more pacific years of his career he has unquestionably done well, and, with others (among whom the first place by far must be given to Mr. EDGAR VINCENT), has been able to preside over, and in great part bring about, an immense improvement in Egyptian finance, Egyptian administration, and in the social and political affairs of Egypt generally. If the first blunders of Mr. GLADSTONE'S policy inflicted loss on Egypt, no foreign occupation has ever so justified itself as ours of that country during the last year or two, and there is no reason whatever to suppose that this favourable state of affairs will cease. It would, however, be a very unfortunate thing if it were to be considered, as some Englishmen seem to consider, that our task in Egypt is done, or that the first convenient opportunity can be safely taken for putting an end to it. Even its internal affairs are far from being finally set on a satisfactory footing, and, were they so, our obligations would be by no means discharged. In the first place, we have to keep Egypt safe, as it is to be feared she will not for some time be able to keep herself safe, against actual foreign aggression. In the second, we have to make sure that, when we give up the task of protection, no other European Power steps in to convert it into one of oppression. And if ever the English nation shakes off the ignoble desire to shirk its duty with which Mr. GLADSTONE has been unweariedly inoculating it for the last twenty years of his life, a higher and wider obligation than either of these will present itself to be fulfilled. It is, unfortunately, undeniable that England brought about that retreat from the interior which has, for the first time for centuries, exposed Egypt to the attacks of barbarous tribes; that England deprived Egypt of the vast and promising territories which naturally belong to whatever Power holds the Lower Nile; that England practically commanded the abandonment of North-East Central Africa, from the Cataracts to the Congo, as a prey to the slave-hunter and the savage. This debt has to be paid some day, and our present occupation of Egypt is but a thing preparatory to the payment; while the abandonment of Egypt would simply put us in the position of perpetual defaulters.

In the further East considerable but unnecessary anxiety seems to be excited by the operations on the Thibetan frontier. That a member of Parliament of the name of SCHWANN should want to know whether we are going to pursue an aggressive policy, and be snubbed for his pains, is all quite natural, as well as that in his question he should show an entire ignorance of what "the forward "policy" means. But some people more reasonable, and perhaps more patriotic, than Mr. SCHWANN seem to be alarmed at the Sikkim war. The matter, however, is very simple, and not in the least alarming, though it may possibly be troublesome. In the long run it depends upon the shadowy powers exercised or claimed by China over districts which have long passed from under direct Chinese sway. As is well known, the States south as well as those north of the great central Himalayan chain—Nepaul, Sikkim, [illegible]—used to owe, and to some extent still owe, a kind of allegiance to Pekin. In the case of Sikkim, a small square block of territory wedged between Nepaul and Bhotan, and running up from Darjeeling to Mount Everest and the true "Roof of the World," this state of affairs is complicated by the fact that the connexion with China, such as it was, was a kind of subinfeudation to Thibet. The Rajah of Tumloong long received subventions regularly from both the Thibetan and the Indian Governments. Recently Thibetan invaders have tried to convert this nominal and shadowy hold into an actual occupation of territory which has long been acknowledged as an Indian "protected" State, and they have had to be driven out. There has been no difficulty in doing this, except the difficulty of the country and the approach of the rainy season. We do not want to send a retaliatory force into Thibet itself, or to "occupy Lhassa," and the Thibetans know it, and are obstinate accordingly, while they are, like most of these hill races, tolerable fighters. But there is no reason to suppose that their conduct is inspired by or authorized from Pekin, in which case alone there would be any real awkwardness in the matter. There will probably have to be for some time an occupation of garrisons with seasoned native troops to check Thibetan raids, and if the Thibetans are very troublesome, it may be necessary to retaliate; but that will be their doing, not ours. In the long run, especially if they force further action upon us, the result, whether amicably or forcibly obtained, can hardly be anything but the opening of the passes into Thibet and a valuable extension of Indian trade. This is in the ordinary course of events; and it need be in no respect an alarming instance of that course, unless complications at present unforeseen and unlikely should arise. As for "aggression," it exists only in the patriotic and well-informed imagination of persons like Mr. Schwann. The Indian Government is not foolish enough to try to provoke the races and powers existing on its northern frontier, with all of whom it is its desire to live on good terms, so that the great wall of the Himalayas should be, as it were, garnished with defensive outworks occupied by friends. But the slightest glance at the map will show any one that no intrusion southwards over the range into such a position as that of Sikkim could be tolerated; and it is this which is being kept off by a doubtless troublesome, but quite unavoidable, "little war."

PEERS AND ELECTIONS.

THE House of Lords has unfortunately so little to do that it can occasionally afford to employ itself with matters of secondary importance. Lord Milltown, who has a laudable desire to provide business for the House, has moved for a Committee to inquire into the right of interference by peers in elections to the House of Commons. During the last Session Mr. Bradlaugh proposed to omit from the Sessional Orders the assertion that such interference is a violation of the privileges of the House of Commons. His object was, of course, not to invite intrusion on the part of the peers, but ironically to suggest that the prohibition is habitually disregarded. The House of Commons thought the matter important enough to justify the appointment of a Committee, which in due course reported in accordance with the claim of the Commons and with popular opinion. The Sessional Order was first made at the very beginning of the Civil War in 1641, and it has since, notwithstanding occasional criticism, been renewed in every subsequent year. The Commission further report that the Sessional Order has never been formally questioned by the peers, and they express the doubtful opinion that the Courts of Law would take notice of the validity of the rule. The House of Commons has necessarily been bound by its own declaration, and the only adverse criticism to which the dogma has been exposed consists in the utter disregard with which all parties have treated its articles. Constitutional propositions which are opposed to the operation of natural forces have a tendency to collapse into fictions. The House of Commons during two centuries and a half has consoled itself for an interference which it could not prevent by the protest which, in spite of Mr. Bradlaugh, still appears on the face of its proceedings. An inaccurate or doubtful assertion acquires little additional validity from perpetual repetition. As Lord Salisbury reminded Lord Milltown, the appointment in every Parliament of Triers of Petitions from Gascony or Guienne would scarcely render valid a claim on behalf of the Crown of England to the sovereignty of Bordeaux. It was perhaps hardly worth while to grant a Committee. All the world knows that the two Houses have for two centuries and a half practically agreed to differ on the question whether peers ought to do what during the greater part of the time they habitually and notoriously did. The dispute included two or three subsidiary issues. The Commons declared that they were sole judges of their own privileges; and the Lords contended that neither House could separately alter or authoritatively declare the law. Mr. Bradlaugh's nice sense of fitness will probably for some time longer be offended by a constitutional paradox.

On the whole, the peers have had the best in the controversy. They have not only maintained in words their right of interference, but they have systematically interfered. In a constitutional country it is impossible to prevent any class of the community from exercising any power which it happens to possess. Down to 1832 a large number of seats in the House of Commons was given away or sold by great proprietors, of whom the majority were peers. The patrons can scarcely be said not to have interfered with elections in which they were themselves the sole constituents. A protest against practices which no one prevented or tried to prevent was at best a harmless formality; but it is worth remembering that the resolution of the House of Commons was contemporaneous with the system of nomination boroughs. The peers were not even satisfied with their acknowledged right of returning a fourth or fifth part of the House of Commons. They also took an active part, though perhaps with some personal reserve, in county elections. The boroughmongers, as they were called by hostile critics, were kept in countenance by capitalists who bought seats for one or more Parliaments at a tariff which was well known in the market. Sir Samuel Romilly took just credit to himself for buying a seat in the House, as the arrangement by which he could best maintain his independence. There is some ground for a statement of Mr. Gladstone's that the unreformed Parliament with all its anomalies was intellectually, if not morally, superior to the freely-elected Legislatures of modern times; but the system was untenable when it once ceased to be taken for granted. The Duke of Northumberland, the Duke of Rutland, Lord Lonsdale, and Lord Darlington returned among them nearly forty members of Parliament. Lord Clive, after his return from India, even before he was himself a peer of Great Britain, nominated eleven or twelve members. There was no doubt that the borough-owners, though many of them were patriotic, used their Parliamentary power in part for the benefit of their families and friends. After the passing of the Reform Bill, the few borough seats which still belonged to their former proprietors were more often than in former times made a refuge for distinguished politicians; but in these cases also the patrons failed to notice the declaration of the House of Commons.

At present there seems to be little occasion for the periodical alarm of the House of Commons. For twenty years past there have been no nominations by peers or private persons, nor is it easy to understand why there should still be a dread of aristocratic influence. Of late years a modus vivendi has been tacitly established, by which collisions between the two Houses are made rare and improbable. A peer who thinks that he can promote the interests of his party by canvassing a neighbouring district takes the chair at election meetings, or makes speeches in favour of a candidate, as long as the election is not technically in progress. He is supposed to be merely exercising his constitutional rights in a political contest. When the writ is issued the peer no longer exhibits himself in public, though he may perhaps still control the machinery of the election. There are plausible reasons for and against the interference of peers. It may be said that they are deeply interested in the welfare of the country, and therefore in the selection of fit members to the more powerful branch of the Legislature. On the other hand, it may be urged that, as members of a privileged class, and of one House of Parliament, they already enjoy their full share of political power; but few active politicians will be deterred by delicate scruples. The head of a great family, if he happens to be popular, will necessarily add strength to the party which he supports. A few years ago one powerful nobleman was represented in the House of Commons by three sons and a brother, all sitting for counties or divisions of counties. The chief of the house may probably have abstained from personal interference, but it was through his influence that members of his family were preferred to less fortunate competitors. If the son of a Duke canvasses his father's tenants or neighbours, it is unnecessary to tell them that their support will be acceptable to their friend or landlord.

The conventional jealousy of the House of Lords which is supposed to be felt by commoners, and especially by members of the House, is not merely the remnant of an obsolete political system. Those who affect to believe that the House of Lords has outlived its dignity and power will do well to count the relatives of peers who sit in the present House of Commons. A Second Chamber selected on grounds of personal merit and distinction would not be so largely represented in an elected House of Parliament. Peers and cadets of ennobled families are chosen by popular constituencies because their chiefs still possess greater influence than any class of the community of equal numbers. Parliamentary elections are represented and anticipated in all the local institutions of the neighbourhood. There is no law by which at a meeting for business or for pleasure a neighbouring peer should, almost as a matter of course, be asked to preside. If there were a resolution of the House of Commons by which his acceptance of the invitation was condemned as unconstitutional, it would probably be as inoperative as the form which Mr. BRADLAUGH not unreasonably denounces as contrary to the fact. The Report of the Committee will be expected without eager curiosity. Lord SALISBURY may have been right in accepting the challenge which in his judgment has been offered by the House of Commons, but the contest which has lasted so long will not be terminated by the declarations of either party. The question might perhaps have been conveniently referred to the Committee on the Standing Orders of the House of Lords which was appointed at the instance of the Government. The need of an inquiry or of a codification of the Orders is neither obvious nor pressing; but the investigation is apparently to be in some manner combined with proposals for the creation of life peers and for the exercise of a novel jurisdiction over disreputable members. Both schemes are intended as concessions to the agitation for the reform or abolition of the House of Lords. Lord SALISBURY is too sagacious to expect any great advantage from either of his proposed experiments; but he has always been in favour of the appointment of life peers, and some of his supporters have persuaded themselves that the House of Lords ought to possess a censorial power and to note offenders against propriety. It would perhaps be better to leave half a dozen delinquents to the heavy social penalties which they have incurred on the Turf or in the Divorce Court. None of them are likely to court the disapprobation of their equals in rank by taking conspicuous part in the proceedings of the House of Lords; but, if the new legislation is unnecessary, it can on this point do little harm. The project of making life peers is not open to the same objection; but it can scarcely be expected to do any considerable good. What the House of Lords wants is not experience or ability, which it possesses in abundance, but strength to maintain itself against Democratic agitation. It is certain that the new contrivance will not perceptibly abate the agitation; and the existence of life peerages will be used as an argument against the far more important principle of hereditary succession. The measure will meet with no serious opposition in the House of Lords, and it will probably pass the House of Commons. If it should be defeated in the present Session by lapse of time, it will probably pass hereafter. The life peers will but rarely come into collision with the Sessional Order of the House of Commons.

SIR FRANCIS DOYLE.

THE death of Sir FRANCIS DOYLE has robbed his friends of one of the kindest and most engaging of companions, and England of a poet and a patriot. If patriotism were dead in every other heart, apparently it would live still in poets. However they may differ in art, in love of their country, at least, they all agree. It is needless to speak of what Lord TENNYSON and Mr. SWINBURNE have written for the sake of England. Mr. BROWNING has acknowledged that "here and here did England help me," and Mr. MATTHEW ARNOLD'S mockeries were only an embittered form of sympathy with her who,

> Nor to left, goes passively by,
> Bearing on shoulders immense,
> Atlantean, the load,
> Well nigh not to be borne,
> Of the too vast orb of her fate.

Shortly, let it be said that the English rhymer who has not shown a love of England is no poet at all. But in the verse of Sir FRANCIS DOYLE England was the chief figure. He loved her like a mistress. She was his LAURA or his BEATRICE. In the preface to his poems (of 1883) he speaks about himself as one bereft of ambition, and without care for anything but "my family, my friends, and my country, "of whose future I try not to despair." It has been hard work not to despair; and in his latest day his "last verses" (as he truly called them)—lines yet unpublished—went back to the memory of one of our admirals—to the memory of RODNEY. He had seen the decadence of the old England all his days. "It was during my childhood," he said in one of his Oxford lectures, "that SCOTT rose to the height of his "renown; and I make it my business to hold up, through "good report and evil report, the banner under which I "enlisted when a boy"—the banner of Bellenden. Sir FRANCIS DOYLE, then, saw the change in English spirit between the days when the Liddesdale men, on an alarm of invasion, marched all night to their rallying-place at Hawick, playing "Little Jock Elliot," and this agreeable time, when our marches are "demonstrations" and every Power "daur meddle" with England. But at least he did uphold in his poems that banner of his childhood. Except CAMPBELL'S two famous pieces, there are, perhaps, no English songs of battle and endurance that stir the blood like "The "Red Thread of Honour," "The Loss of the Birkenhead," "Alice Ayres," and other pieces of Sir FRANCIS DOYLE'S. The Laureate's "Charge of the Light Brigade" is more popular than Sir FRANCIS DOYLE'S, but it does not contain a verse like this:—

> We do not call their lives ill spent
> It to all time they show,
> That where the Light Brigade was sent
> The Light Brigade would go!

The melancholy of his poem on MELVILL and COGHILL, who carried the colours through the Zulu army to the English side of the Tugela and there died, is also very noble:—

> It was as if the intense desire through earth, air, water wrought, > Pass'd from them with their passing souls and home the colours brought.

Sir FRANCIS DOYLE'S appreciation of gallantry and self-devotion was not limited by delight in battle nor by love of country. As the hill-tribe decorated our eleven men with the Thread of Double Honour, so he spared a song for our slain foe, MEHRAB KHAN. He translated, with more sympathy perhaps than success, THÉOPHILE GAUTIER'S dirge of the Old Guard, Vieux de la Vieille. His liking for GAUTIER was rather strange in a genius that seemed so insular, and it is curious that his rendering of that "pan-"theistic madrigal," Affinités Secrètes, was decidedly more successful than his attempt at praising the Old Guard in English. Probably it was a mere coincidence of idea which made him devote a poem to IPHITION, a Trojan slain by ACHILLES, who, in Sir FRANCIS DOYLE'S lines, utters the very speech of LUCIAN'S ANTILOCHUS in Hades. He rebukes ACHILLES for longing to be "the thrall of a landless man on "earth, rather than prince of all the dead," and even in Hades is content like LUCIAN'S ANTILOCHUS, with human fortunes. Sir FRANCIS DOYLE seldom spoke his mind publicly in prose. But, when lecturing on SCOTT from the Chair of Poetry at Oxford, he confessed that "it made his blood hot to "hear Ministers say that England will never stand a conscrip-"tion, and repudiate the great primordial duty of mankind," the defence of our own. However, there is a more excellent way of doing a primordial duty than by conscription, and the English people would do it yet if the wirepullers of party would let them. The insane devotion to trade of half a century was also among the regrets of Sir FRANCIS DOYLE. Very many years have passed since he described the crowd at the St. Leger, and

> The shallow, shrivelled artisan,
> Twisted below the height of man
> Whose limbs and life have mouldered down
> Within some foul and clouded town.

In everything but scope of genius Sir FRANCIS DOYLE prolonged the strain of Sir WALTER SCOTT. Both had the Homeric spirit of battle, both had the Homeric love of a good horse, both loved their country more than themselves, and knew no private joy like her success, no private sorrow like her failure. Sir FRANCIS had not one drop of the bitter blood of the minor poet. In lines addressed to Mr. Gladstone—long ago—he defended his rights, impugned by the Romans, and maintained that mediocribus esse poetis was granted by the Gods, if not by men and booksellers. He was very content to be a minor poet:—

> At my own tune I give the world my own.
> It does not please you? Leave it, then, alone.

He envied no man his laurels, and grudged no man his gold. His poems were never popular; perhaps the volumes seemed overloaded by classical and other pieces, not of distinguished or unusual merit. We cannot but believe that a selection, containing only his poems of patriotism, of battle, and of sport, would be as popular as they would certainly be "tonic" and spirit-stirring. However this may be, it is with pride as well as with sorrow that we leave a stainless gentleman, a true poet, a man happy in all but the evil days of his country. We leave him, like his own heroes, forgetful of all pain

High among those who have not lived, who have not died in vain.

SCARLET DAY AT CAMBRIDGE.

THE newspapers which are of the Gladstonian persuasion may be congratulated on having shown in most cases a sense of the judicious in their comments, or absence of comment, on the festivities of last Saturday at Cambridge. The Daily News, indeed, delivered itself of a graceful parallel between the hue of Mr. BALFOUR's doctor's gown and "a "certain Irish prefix to Mr. BALFOUR's name"; but even this cannot be called very crushing, and even this was not in the leader columns. In other and obscurer quarters the loyalty which is so conspicuous in Gladstonians relieved itself by delicate remarks on the intellectual qualifications of Prince EDWARD. Otherwise there was comparative silence, if not utter silence, as to the real significance of the occasion. Yet that significance was not inconsiderable. In a general way, of course, these academic festivals pereunt and hardly imputantur. Their festivity and their seriousness are equally passing. And here, too, there may have been trivialities. It may or may not be true that Cambridge was stirred (to say stirred to its foundations might seem a wicked allusion to an irreverent legend of the sister University) on the great question of Bands; that another paroxysm arose on the question of the fit vesture of that youngest doctoral birth of time a Doctor of Letters; or that in consequence of the not unusual vagaries of academic draughtsmanship it was discovered, only just in time to remedy the defect, that in the zeal of reform and in doing away with the ancient privilege by which noblemen could obtain degrees in less than the ordinary time, it had been unwittingly brought about that the noblemen now concerned could not obtain degrees at all. These little fables always fly about, their pinions imped by no matter what slender allowance of truth, on such occasions, and die like the May-flies that they are.

But it is not every day or every year that one of the oldest and most venerable institutions of the kingdom—one which, though Mr. GLADSTONE does not think so, is in a sense only shared by one other, representative of all ranks, of all classes, of all the better, the nobler, the more distinctive elements of English life—has to select or to receive a certain body of persons to be clad with the highest honours at its disposal in company with one who, the fates permitting, will be one day the Sovereign of Great Britain and Ireland. And even such an occasion, rare as it is, might occur without the additional significance which was given to it by certain circumstances of the hour. Not very long ago, as readers of the Saturday Review will remember, certain members of the University of Cambridge took upon themselves to affect to give a welcome to persons whose desire it is to destroy the Union—the "Paper "Union," as it seems to please its enemies to term it—between the various parts of this country. It was suggested, rather to the annoyance of some of these learned men, that this welcome was not exactly the welcome of the University. Now it will scarcely be denied that the welcome of Saturday last was the welcome of the University, and it can hardly have been an accident that that welcome was addressed in an entirely different direction. True, there was Lord ROSEBERY; but Lord ROSEBERY's Home Ruleism is of such an exceedingly mild type that we hardly think a throb of gratitude can have passed through the great heart of Mr. DILLON or Mr. O'BRIEN when they read his name on the list. Perhaps it is an accident that the Chancellor of the University of Oxford happens to be the head of the Unionist party; yet it is not an everyday accident for the Chancellor of one University to receive a degree at the other. Perhaps Mr. JOHN BRIGHT, to whom the greatest compliment of the day was paid, might have had a Cambridge doctorate any year that he pleased; yet still the chapter of accidents made it this year and not another. And such another accident, no doubt, may have been Lord SELBORNE's Unionism; and Lord RANDOLPH CHURCHILL's, whose degree the Separatist party, forgetting at once manners and that precept of wisdom which forbids the exposing of nakedness, had endeavoured to non-placet, with the result of a beating by twelve to one; and Mr. GOSCHEN's, and Mr. RAIKES's, and, above all, Mr. BALFOUR's. But, when such a number of accidents happens to coincide in such circumstances, the most philosophical of doubters is warranted in suspecting that there may be a little design behind them.

Unless the Public Orator is so styled because he conceals the public thoughts of his University, Dr. SANDYS would appear to have in his very excellent oration put the dots on the i's in this sense to a very unusual extent. The resources of a learned language, as well as its obscurity, are infinite; and if the University had wished, or if the Public Orator had thought that it wished, to sit on the fence in this matter, there are plenty of points in Lord SALISBURY's character and record which could have been dwelt upon without praising him, "for that the parts of these British islands, "at present united, he suffereth not to be torn asunder." The consistency of Lord SELBORNE, though undeniable, is not that one of his many merits which it is kind to certain former colleagues of his to dwell upon at the present moment, unless there is an object in so doing; and we do not know that Sir WILLIAM HARCOURT will have been as much amused as he will no doubt pretend to have been at hearing laudations of the patriotism of Mr. GOSCHEN. And as for the words of the speech about Mr. BALFOUR—Mr. BALFOUR of the "certain Irish prefix"—the periods of the orator and the cheers of his audience must here have been most distressing of all to those other members of the University who were welcoming certain other persons in Cambridge not long ago. If it had been at Oxford, which has malignancy and tyranny by kind, the thing might have been tolerable, or at least to be expected. But that at Cambridge—at Cambridge which used to boast of admitting no force but argument—the persecutor of the "martyred "saints whose breeks Lie scattered in the Irish prisons cold" should be complimented on his being the man "to govern "that part of our islands with just counsels, to the comfort "of all good men and the terror of all evil," on being "one who for that reason is received with the plaudits "of all good citizens, because he will not permit the bonds "of the Union to be broken," and that the paragraph should be ended by the actual quotation, by the enshrining in the sacred language, as it were, of the University herself of the abhorrent "Tria juncta in uno" and the insolent "Quis "separabit?"—this is, indeed, cruel to "other members of the University."

To speak more seriously, we are exceedingly glad that Dr. SANDYS had the resolution to speak out in this fashion. And we say this, at the same time holding most strongly, and refusing absolutely to give up or abate one jot of the very sound and admirable doctrine, that a University as such ought to have no party politics. The whole contention of Unionists is that this is not a party question; any more than it would be a party question whether an Englishman was justified in making private terms with enemies landed on the coast of the country. It is the contention, not by any means of the whole, but of a certain part of the Separatists, that Home Rule is a party question, and that any attempt to treat them as if they were out of the pale of political charity is consequently unjust. And by dint of much speaking they have got some of the foolisher sort at Southampton and elsewhere to believe them. It is pretty clear, from the list of political persons (to the non-political persons, from Lord ACTON downwards, we desire to do all honour, but they do not come into the present argument) honoured by Cambridge on Saturday, idcirco quod vincula illa divelli non sinunt, that the University is not of this opinion. And it is useless to attempt to revive the stale accusations against Universities. Even Mr. LABOUCHERE does not, as the Mr. LABOUCHERES of fifty or a hundred years ago used to do, call them, or at least think them, sleepy hollows, nests of debauchery, hives of drivelling and drowsy parsons, and the like. As it happens, by a curious chance, Cambridge can claim two Irish Secretaries, actual or recent, among her most distinguished sons. It would be difficult to imagine a severer rebuke to Sir GEORGE TREVELYAN than is contained in the words of Dr. SANDYS's praise of Mr. BALFOUR.

A LESSON TO RAILWAY COMPANIES.

UNLESS the decision of the Court of Appeal, reversing the judgment of Mr. Justice MANISTY, should in its turn be reversed by the House of Lords, Mr. BUTLER's victory over the Manchester, Sheffield, and Lincolnshire Railway Company will have established a valuable precedent. Railway Companies have the legal power of enacting certain by-laws and the practical power of causing great inconvenience to the travelling public. But as yet they are not absolutely despotic nor entirely above the authority of the common law. The conduct of the Company's servants at Sheffield, or rather at the station near Sheffield where tickets are taken, suggests that this fact will be news to other people besides Mr. Justice MANISTY. Mr. BUTLER, the victim of their very high-handed and rather low-minded proceedings, took a return ticket from Manchester to Sheffield by excursion train at the reduced price of half-a-crown. He gave up one part of his ticket at Manchester, but the other part he afterwards lost. When the train stopped at what we may call the Vauxhall or Kentish Town of Sheffield, he explained the matter to the collector. He likewise offered to pay his whole fare over again, which is quite as much as, in the circumstances, he was bound to do. But the collector, dissatisfied, demanded the ordinary fare, which was elevenpence more. In vain did Mr. BUTLER produce his name and address. In vain, with more than Quixotic generosity and Odyssean resource, did he offer "a copy of his portrait "which he had with him." Few are the passengers who carry about, like Mr. BUTLER, the cherished lineaments of themselves. But even this unusually prompt evidence of identity did not appease the wrath of the collector. Mr. BUTLER was forcibly removed from the carriage, prevented from continuing his journey to Sheffield, and kept at this suburban station for three-quarters of an hour, when he paid the amount demanded. For this outrageous interference with his personal freedom he brought an action of assault, and it seems a pity that he did not add a claim for false imprisonment. It is right to say that, according to the verdict of the jury, no more violence had been used than was necessary to turn Mr. BUTLER out of a carriage in which he had a right to be, and that the damages were only assessed at the very modest sum of twenty-five pounds. Mr. Justice MANISTY appears to think that, by refusing to show his ticket, even if he has lost it, a passenger breaks his contract with the Company, becomes at once a trespasser, and can be deposited without warning at any station on the route. If this eccentric paradox were good law, a traveller would be subject to serious punishment for the most trivial carelessness, or even for mere misfortune.

That railway Companies suffer from innumerable petty frauds is doubtless true. But they must contrive to protect themselves without oppressing the public, for whose benefit they exist. In the case of Mr. BUTLER it is clear that the Company altogether mistook their remedy. They might have sued the plaintiff. They had no right to detain him. If they had brought an action, he would have had a perfectly good defence. He would have proved as defendant, what he actually proved as plaintiff, that he had taken his ticket, and paid for it. There is no magic about half a return ticket. It is only evidence of a contract, a receipt for payment. If the transaction can be established in any other way, the ticket is not required. It is remarkable that no English authority should have been quoted on either side of the argument, and that a single American case—which was rather in the Company's favour—should have been the only one cited at all. The enormous power of Corporations in the United States, which rests upon the constitutional provision against interference with existing contracts, has been much weakened by subsequent decisions since the famous example of Dartmouth College. But it is still far greater than the people of this country would be willing to endure. The experience of Lord Justice LOPES, as related by himself, is perhaps more in point. Being on one occasion in the same plight as Mr. BUTLER, he gave the same explanation, adding, however, the fact that he was Judge of Assize. "I "have heard that story before," observed the astute collector, heedless of the sound rule that it is dangerous in this world to be too clever. The Directors of railway Companies arrogate to themselves a sort of criminal jurisdiction. Not content with the civil process which is open to them, as to all other classes of HER MAJESTY's subjects, they want to execute summary justice upon everybody who does not comply with the minutest regulation in the obscurest corner of a ticket or time-table. The Court of Appeal has now, apparently for the first time, held that a passenger cannot be ejected from a railway-carriage because he is not provided with a ticket. Lord Justice LINDLEY did, indeed, hint that a by-law might be made to that effect, while Lord Justice LOPES inclined to think that it would be ultra vires. If it would not, it certainly ought to be. The public does not exist for the benefit of railways.

THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BILL.

THE most unmixed improvement which has been made in the Local Government Bill—next to the dropping of the Licensing Clauses—is the substitution of the ancient title of Alderman, or rather County Alderman, for the awkward description of Selected Councillor. As for the licensing clauses themselves, the wild exhilaration over their excision seems to forget that they were introduced as a concession, and that, the concessionaries proving recalcitrant, they have been left in the lurch by a withdrawal which certainly does not annoy the supporters of the Government most. As for the Aldermen, it might even be contended that the change is useful as well as ornamental, inasmuch as it reminds the House of Commons that the measure purports to be an extension of the Municipal Corporations Act. It is not perhaps universally admitted that the institution of Aldermen has been highly beneficent; but there is always a probability in favour of a system which, after considerable experience, has not been condemned by any party. Mr. SMITH has promised to devise, if possible, a method by which a casual majority may be prevented from perpetuating its own existence; and it has been suggested that county Aldermen should not be allowed to vote when vacancies occur in their own body. In counties, as in boroughs, the Council may appoint Aldermen who have not been previously elected by the ratepayers; but in this respect they will probably follow the example of the urban Corporations. It seems that the proportion of Aldermen taken from the outside has always been insignificant, and the same result will almost certainly occur in County Councils. There may perhaps be some advantage in preferring candidates who have previously been returned by a popular constituency. A Mayor or Chairman or county Alderman chosen from the general mass of the inhabitants would not represent the majority of voters so fully as an elected Councillor promoted by the suffrages of his colleagues. A more conclusive reason for preference would be found in the natural desire of the members of the Council to reserve to themselves the right of succession to municipal dignities. The whole question is not of primary importance in the case of the county Aldermen. The efficiency of the new municipalities will depend much more on the capacity of the Chairmen than on the votes of the privileged minority of the Council. Unless the voters take care to return one or more capable candidates for the presidency of the Council, the working of the new system will be liable to local failure. The first attempt to set the machine in motion will especially require the initiative of an able and experienced man of business.

The clauses relating to county Aldermen naturally gave rise to a debate on the merits of secondary election. There seems to be no reason why a constituency which, in the first instance, derives its title from popular suffrage should not be competent to select the members of a national or municipal Assembly. The nominees of the mass of the people would seem to be a kind of aristocracy, and the choice of their representatives can seldom be an extraordinarily difficult function. It is, nevertheless, essential to the success of such an experiment that the voters at the second election should not have been chosen for that special purpose. One Legislature may sometimes be competent to elect another by the independent exercise of its judgment; but those who have been appointed for that purpose only can seldom do more than obey the mandate of the original voters. The most conspicuous instance in Europe of secondary election is the Lower House of the Prussian Parliament, the members of which are returned by electors who are themselves chosen by universal suffrage. An Assembly thus constituted thwarted the policy of Prince BISMARCK in his earlier years of office, and he has since regarded it with little favour. The extension of the term of service in the Chamber from three years to five is not the first [illegible] unstable or [illegible] Dislike for secondary election, or rather for its [illegible] probably induced the CHANCELLOR to take the rash step of founding the German Lower House on direct and universal suffrage. It cannot be said that thus far the constitution of the Prussian Parliament has been either fully justified or utterly condemned by its operation. Two earlier and more instructive experiments have been tried in the United States with curiously opposite results. The election of the President by an independent Commission or body appointed for the purpose by the several States was intended to be one of the most effective elements of the Federal Constitution; yet from the first the Presidential electors have been merely the mouthpieces of those from whom they derived their office and instructions. Their very existence is almost forgotten while they discharge their Ministerial function; and, if they were to exercise an independent choice, they would be sharply reminded that in America there are fundamental laws which are not embodied in the Constitution. As they are absolutely powerless, their formal intervention has done no harm, but probably on some convenient occasion their office will be abolished.

On the other hand, the Senate which is elected by the State Legislatures is, with an exception which need not be here discussed, the most efficient of Second Chambers, and it is more powerful than the House of Representatives which proceeds from popular election. It can scarcely be said that the Senate in the present day derives any considerable part of its influence from the fact that it represents the partially obsolete element of State sovereignty. Its proceedings are now regarded both by itself and by the community at large as those of a legislative body of uniform composition. It is doubtful whether it would have been equally successful if, as in the case of the President, Senatorial electors had been appointed with the sole duty of nominating Senators. There are, no doubt, other reasons for the preponderance of the Senate, but the mode in which it is appointed must also be taken into consideration. The State Assemblies have many other duties to perform in addition to their elected function, and, consequently, their members are chosen without any direct or exclusive reference to their character as secondary voters. It is true that in modern times State politics are largely affected by their bearing on the nomination of a Senator; but, if only with a view to victory, the contending parties in the State Legislatures almost always put forward their ablest leaders. There is no doubt that, in consequence, the Senate is far above the ordinary level of political capacity. The descent from large things to small in reasoning from the American Senate to an English County Council is perhaps too abrupt; but the proportion may be constant when the magnitudes are enormously reduced. It is, on the whole, desirable to apply on a small scale to the new municipalities contrivances analogous to those which regulate the working of great national institutions. The Councillors who will select the county Aldermen will have been chosen for a different purpose, and they will not be compelled, like Presidential electors, to consult their own constituents in the administration of their patronage. It is, unfortunately, true that secondary election has of late been discredited in the government of London; but the miscarriages of the Metropolitan Board of Works have no necessary connexion with the mode of election by the Vestries.

If the Metropolitan Board of Works had been elected by direct household suffrage, its members would, in all probability, have been exactly similar in position and character to those who are now connected with questionable transactions. The practical inference from recent scandals is that ordinary members of the class from which municipal administrators are chosen require official control and supervision when they dispose of great sums of money, of profitable contracts, and of much miscellaneous patronage. Aspersions of the same kind have lately been thrown on some provincial Corporations, where the constituencies rather than their municipal representatives are the promoters of corruption. It is said that a habit has been formed of undertaking costly public works on the ground that they will cause a large demand for labour, while the expense will fall on the more substantial ratepayers. The rural municipalities will start with the advantage of sound traditions. The present ruling body has never been accused of pecuniary laxity, and perhaps a good example will produce a wholesome effect. The County Councils will not be the less scrupulous because a portion of their number will have been chosen by the residue. Even in London, notwithstanding the clamour which may be raised against secondary election, there will be the ordinary proportion of Aldermen. They will not be more liable than their elected colleagues to the temptation of exercising their opportunities; and, as few of them will probably belong to the working classes, their personal interest will lie in the direction of economy rather than of profuse expenditure. Some of those who are likely to be the most active managers of municipal as of Parliamentary contests have themselves belonged to organizations which are entirely dependent on secondary election. The Caucus, which has been oddly denounced by Mr. CHAMBERLAIN, is deliberately founded on secondary election. The primary assemblies, as in the United States, from which the system was borrowed, consist of all the members of the party who choose to take part in the proceedings. The next step in advance is the election by general suffrage of the nominally governing body. The mass of the constituency is, therefore, finally disfranchised almost as soon as it has come into existence. The real power is probably exercised by an Executive Council, which again is nominated by the ostensibly representative body. The number of successive elections or eliminations of the popular element may perhaps vary in different places; but the whole scheme of the Caucus depends, as has been said, on election by those who have themselves been previously elected. It is not known that the Caucus includes members corresponding to county Aldermen, but the wirepullers are a much more powerful and more permanent portion of the Caucus. It is yet uncertain whether speculations on the character of the County Councils can be profitably attempted. There is too much reason to fear that, instead of choosing competent managers of local affairs, the ratepayers will concentrate all their energies on the maintenance or suppression of public-houses.

THE LAW OF LIBEL.

SIR ALGERNON BORTHWICK'S Bill for the relief of Sir ALGERNON BORTHWICK and others from the consequences of some of the torts they may inadvertently commit has now assumed a shape in which it may be submitted to the House of Lords without absolute disrespect to that distinguished body. It is probable, however, that in one point it may be further amended next week, and if it is not, the House of Lords will have to do more than merely assent to the measure. This point is the provision in Clause 5 that where a newspaper has "inserted an apology" for a libel, originally published without malice and without negligence, the defendant shall be entitled to a verdict without having made any payment into Court. To this enactment there is the obvious objection pointed out here last week, and relied upon in Wednesday's debate by Mr. KELLY, that where a libel has been published, followed in a subsequent issue of the newspaper by an apology, a wrong has been committed for which no reparation has been made, and the effect of which has been only partially undone, and that, therefore, the person libelled ought to be able to recover compensation, and ought not, if he seeks to do so, to have to pay the defendant's costs. Mr. DARLING intimated that he would move, on the report, an amendment substituting for the provision that in such a case the plaintiff shall not recover "any damages "except such special damages as he can prove that he has "sustained by the publication of such libel" words to the effect that, unless the jury find a verdict for the plaintiff for forty shillings, judgment with costs shall be entered for the defendant. This would be an improvement on the clause as it stands; but it is a clumsy enactment that, where the jury think the plaintiff ought to have a pound, he is to have nothing, and to pay the defendant's costs. The reason for requiring payment into court as a condition of successfully pleading an apology is in reality unassailable. No substantial injustice done to owners of newspapers by the present law has been or can be suggested, and the total omission of the clause would decidedly improve the Bill. Unless some more convenient amendment than the one promised by Mr. DARLING can be devised, it is to be hoped that the clause will be struck out in the House of Lords.

The thirty-eight members who opposed the sixth clause deserve well of the country for their anxiety on behalf of libelled persons; but, though they included some members whose opinion is of great value, it is probable that the clause will do little or no harm, while there may unquestionably be cases in which it will be useful. Its effects will depend a great deal upon the manner of its administration by juries. It is to the credit of the House of Commons that, though some impulsive journalists made speeches in support of the impudent proposal to exact security for costs from plaintiffs in actions for libel, no voice was raised in its favour when the question was put from the chair. The 8th Clause, as amended, is perhaps not likely to do much harm. It is also not likely to prevent any injustice. Criminal prosecutions for libel against persons who are not in any sense morally as well as legally responsible for them are far from common. As the clause now stands it will be for the defendant to prove that he was not party or privy to the publication, and that it did not arise from any want of care on his part. It may be doubted whether any person who could have proved this has been convicted of libel in modern times. Taking the Bill altogether, it will be an improvement on the existing law if the 5th Clause is amended or omitted, as it probably will be in one House of Parliament or the other.

EXPENSE OF REORGANIZATIONS.

IT would seem that Mr. JENNINGS is so far like Don QUIXOTE that he is made up of alternate layers of two very different things. The Don's elements were sanity and madness lying side by side. Mr. JENNINGS's are Toryism and Radicalism, and we can only hope that they will also remain distinct and that the venom of the Radicalism will not corrupt the integrity of his sounder principles. On Tuesday night he showed the Radical streak. Mr. JENNINGS had a lurking suspicion that he would be open to the reproach, and showed it by saying that honourable members who sat on the Government side of the House were tolerably sure to be called by this term of reproach if they defended true economy. The member for Stockport must not lay that flattering unction to his soul. It was not his love of economy which was Radical about him, but his claptrap, his appeals to the gallery, and the Irish gallery, too, which were rewarded by so much Opposition cheers and laughter. It was not love of economy, for instance, which dictated some nonsense of Mr. JENNINGS about the so-called good families and the fatigue of the country which had to support them. The materials of this remark were mere Radical envy and ignorance, which are very old both of them, and are repeated nowadays, not because they can make even a caricature of the real state of things, but because they are bits of familiar gag always to be relied upon to draw a cheer from one part of the House at least. Mr. JENNINGS might have shown his love of true economy quite as effectually without lashing himself up into a state of rhetorical fury over imaginary abuses, and parading worn-out commonplaces. Neither did he at all strengthen his case, but the contrary, by describing Ministers and public officials as leagued in a conspiracy to defraud the public. That also is claptrap, and should be heard nowhere but on the stump.

The faults of Mr. JENNINGS's form do not, however, prove that he was in the wrong on the main issue. His victory over the Government is not an incident which affects us much. Such defeats do not greatly hurt a Ministry, and if, as is not improbably the case, this one was partly due to want of foresight and care on the part of the Ministerial Whips, the lesson might have been given on a more serious occasion, and with worse consequences. In inducing a majority of the House to vote that some recent reorganizations in public offices have been wasteful Mr. JENNINGS was doing very good work. Mr. CHILDERS's elaborate figures and Lord GEORGE HAMILTON's spirited rally do not prove that officials still capable of work have not often been, and are not continually, pensioned off in a wasteful way, or that our recurrent reorganizations do not frequently end in nothing better than a mere change of names and places. To account for this blundering by a conspiracy among the officials is absurd. It is the outcome partly of a bad old tradition continued by gentlemen who are just as honestly zealous for the public service as Mr. JENNINGS, though, like him, mistaken in the exact way of doing things. Another and more effectual cause is simply outside clamour. Whenever anything goes wrong, and there is an outcry against the system, or whenever we have a spasm of economy, there is a cry for changes and rearrangement and suppressions. Of course there is a Commission, and something is done of which the effects are soon visible in the pension-list. The dislocation of the department causes a good deal of loss of time and temper. Then things settle down, and as the Minister has been stirred up into attending sharply to his department, of course there is an improvement. "The master's eye"—but the proverb is something musty. In this case the growing of the corn is accounted for by the reorganization—till in a few years it is found that the system is sick again, and then the doctoring begins anew, always with the same effect on the pension-list. It is true, undeniably true, that men in middle life, or still young, are retired on pensions when they would and could work. To say that these fortunate persons are put to take their ease on the shelf because room must be found for younger and more energetic men, is a favourite official platitude which makes the mere private person open the eye of amazement. What amount of genius is required to make a head clerk in a Government office? Supposing that a sportive djinn were to take fifty Government upper division clerks, and a similar number of the prompt and polite gentlemen who attend to one's little affairs at one's bank, and were then to vice versâ them—to play the BULTITUDE trick with them—which would have its work worse done at the end of a month, the bank or the Government office? Would there be a pin to choose between them? The truth is that a great deal of nonsense is talked about the work done in Government offices, of which vastly the greater part requires no qualities but the very average brains and decent industry which are expected and obtained from cashiers in banks. A healthy man of fifty who is not fit to do it—or thinks it beneath his dignity to do what he is told off to do, as he would in a bank—is fit for dismissal, and not for a pension of 700*l.* a year. By far the greater part of the extravagance in our public offic s is not due to undue favour shown to incompetents, but to our endless schemes of reorganization, with their unvarying additions to the pension-list. In voting against these the House of Commons did well, and if it is partly to blame in the matter itself (a very tenable proposition), that is no reason why it should not repent. The only way it has of showing its repentance is by voting against any more of the samr thing.

THE SATURDAY REVIEW IN THE HOUSE OF LORDS.

IT is matter of respectful surprise to us that two peers of such gravity and authority as the leader of the Opposition in the Upper House and the LORD CHANCELLOR should have expressed, the former astonishment, and the latter indignation, at a statement in these columns which neither of them can possibly have read. Lord GRANVILLE complained of the Saturday Review for having represented that "on the "occasion of two noble lords rising at the same moment to "address the House, and neither of them giving way, the "LORD CHANCELLOR had called upon one of them to speak." And Lord HALSBURY, after complaining that the statement (which we were supposed to have made) could not have been founded on anything which "the most perverted or the most "perverse imagination could present in such a light," and that there was a "subtlety in the phrase used by the writer" which would induce people to think that the Chancellor referred to was himself, concluded by expressing "a suspicion "that, if he contradicted the statement, the writer of the "article would probably say, 'Oh, the noble Earl and the "'LORD CHANCELLOR are very ignorant, because over forty "'years ago an incident of that sort did take place.'" This suspicion, however, is not—or not wholly—well founded; for we should not reply that "an incident of that sort took "place over forty years ago," because the incident to which we referred was one of a totally different sort, and took place less than ten years ago. What we said was, that there had been a quite recent example, not of a Chancellor's "calling upon" one of "two noble lords" to speak, but of his putting the question to the House, as himself one of the two noble lords desiring to speak, that he himself should be heard, of his declaring that question carried in the affirmative, and of his delivering his speech forthwith. And the argument we founded upon that was—but no! If Lord GRANVILLE and Lord HALSBURY were not sufficiently interested in what we were saying to ascertain what it was we did say, they cannot possibly care to know what it was we were endeavouring to prove.

IRELAND.

THE death of Colonel KING-HARMAN is an event to be regretted, not only for those reasons which have caused all but a few of the least worthy of his countrymen to deplore it, but on public grounds also. In a certain sense, of course, there will be no difficulty in filling his place. There are plenty of capable Englishmen whom the Government could appoint to it with the certainty of being abused by the Parnellites for not appointing an Irishman, and at least a sufficiency of capable Irishmen from whom they could make their selection, with the like certainty of being denounced from the same quarter for having selected a "political partisan." But, though the place of the late Parliamentary Under-Secretary may be without difficulty supplied by a successor of ability, firmness, and acquaintance with Ireland, it is not likely that he will combine these three qualifications in anything like the measure in which they were possessed by the last holder of the office. For, if Colonel KING-HARMAN's powers of debate and administration were not—as, in fact, they were not—of any remarkable order, they were nevertheless not merely adequate to the requirements of his position, but far superior to the pretended estimate placed upon them by his insolent adversaries; while as regards steady courage and tenacity, and knowledge not only of the Irish people but of the Irish "politician," his match will be impossible to find in the House of Commons. Every one knows, of course, that it was these latter qualities which made him so supremely obnoxious to his countrymen below the gangway. Their affected detestation of what they were pleased to call his "apostasy" from the Home Rule cause—though it is plain from the public acts and declaration of O'CONNELL that that national hero would have apostatized from the Nationalist movement on precisely the same grounds of repugnance to murder and spoliation—was in reality nothing but their alarmed hatred of a man who knew them—and because he knew them—too well. It was this, of course, which directed against him the full fury of their attacks; and the indifference with which, outwardly at any rate, he faced them of course added fuel to the flame. It is said that he felt keenly the outrageous insults which were showered upon him from the Irish benches; but he never allowed the slightest sign of any such susceptibility to escape him, and the interposition of his good-humoured stoicism between Mr. BALFOUR and his virulent assailants was an advantage to the Government both in its Parliamentary and Executive capacity of no mean order. That his life was shortened, as has been suggested, by the attacks of which he was made the object is possible, but not, we think, probable; and, without some definite evidence on the point, we should be most unwilling to countenance any such supposition. There is nothing, we should imagine, which Colonel KING-HARMAN would have so much resented as the idea that his end could have been hastened by the worryings of the pack that he defied with so fearless a contempt.

There is, perhaps, a certain fitness in the selection of this moment by Mr. PARNELL for paying his party, or "over "fifty members" of it, the unusual compliment of an invitation to dinner. The festivities at the Café Royal appear to have given satisfaction to the guests, and perhaps, after all, the apparently significant absence of such important members of the party as Mr. O'BRIEN, Mr. HEALY, and Mr. TIMOTHY HARRINGTON, may have had no serious meaning. It is, however, curious that no regretful reference should have been made to their absence, if it were really accidental, considering that Mr. SEXTON, in his speech, made special mention of those members of the party whom imprisonment prevented from attending. Whatever its cause, the non-appearance of Mr. O'BRIEN caused the function rather to resemble what, for the sake of sparing a too hard-worked comparison, we will call a recitation of the "Prisoner of Chillon," with the part of BONNIVARD omitted. The formula of Mr. PARNELL's invitation to his party was "to meet those of their number who have "been imprisoned under the provisions of the Crimes Act"; yet the toast of "Our Guests" was first responded to, in the presence of Mr. PYNE, Mr. HOOPER, Mr. GILHOOLY, and other obscurities who have been actually imprisoned, by a luminary of the party who has, no doubt, every other qualification save that of having seen the inside of a gaol. Mr. DILLON has had a sentence of imprisonment passed upon him very late in the day, but he has punctually appealed against it; and, as he is now at liberty on bail, his sacrifices for the cause seem hardly severe enough at present to warrant him in playing the spokesman for the "victims" of Mr. BALFOUR. Perhaps it was a consciousness of this that induced him to echo so loudly Mr. PARNELL's complaint of the undue leniency shown to Irish members of Parliament as compared with the "victims who are not much "before the public gaze—the obscurer persons, the news-"vendors, the humbler shopkeepers," and so forth. To do Mr. DILLON justice, however, he seemed to be quite as much scandalized at the fact that priests get off with lighter sentences than politicians, as with the fact that politicians have a similar advantage over newsvendors. In any case, of course, the matter is one which rests solely within the discretion of the magistrates and judges, and with which the Irish Executive have nothing whatever to do. Nor are we, for our own part, at all concerned to defend the manner in which the magisterial and judicial discretion has been exercised. We would, however, remind the chivalrous Mr. DILLON that the inequality which he now denounces is no new thing; that from the very first administration of the Crimes Act, the penalty of hard labour was attached to some sentences and not to others; and that down to the delivery of this speech by Mr. DILLON —which has been delayed until the practice complained of may be regarded as tolerably well established on the basis of precedent—not a single word of protest has ever been uttered against it, either by the Irish Parliamentary agitators who get the benefit of the distinction in their cases, or by the English Radicals, who have expressed such noisy sympathy for these first-class misdemeanants.

As to the less personal and more political parts of last Wednesday night's oratory there is little to be said. The speakers were, of course, bound to describe their cause as triumphing over "Coercion," and to represent the broken and powerless League as still vigorous and active. Mr. DILLON recounted, with puerile exultation, his success in convening a meeting in Western Clare—a feat which he contrived to compass in this wise. "About three weeks ago," he said, "I sent a confidential messenger to Clare. I could not put "up placards, for fear of drawing the police; but I sent by "word of mouth to the League of Clare, giving them about "five days' notice of my intention to turn up on a certain "remote hill-side." Having then "advanced on Clare "by some circuitous route," he turned up, as per notice, on the remote hill-side, and found about eight thousand people of Western Clare, and certainly all the priests of Western "Clare" (this, at least, we must respectfully take leave to doubt), "assembled in that lonely "place." Well! Et après? One would think from the way in which Irish agitators talk, that the mere fact of assembling has a sort of spiritual or sacramental efficacy of its own—that it was an end in itself, like a prayer-meeting of Covenanters held in despite of CLAVERHOUSE's dragoons, or a celebration of mass under the Terror. An Irish Nationalist meeting has no force or significance except either as a demonstration that the people can defy the law in their thousands, or as an occasion for mutually encouraging each other and being encouraged by agitators to defy the law as individuals. Neither of these purposes can possibly be fulfilled by a meeting which has to be held "on the sly," and which testifies by that very circumstance to the fact that the law cannot be boldly defied, but must be elaborately evaded. Mr. DILLON's references to the Papal Rescript were not much happier. His querulous complaint of the "intemperate, painful, and scandalous language" which had been used against "us" in the case of "the Mansion "House meeting" is a rather overstrained description of Dr. O'DWYER's quietly contemptuous allusion to "that "curious body, the conciliabulum of laymen who sat "upon the POPE in Dublin"; and, generally speaking, Mr. DILLON's remarks on this matter had been rather disastrously discounted by the frank and manly address just delivered by the Bishop of LIMERICK to his diocesan synod. The whole speech of this unimprisoned representative of captives, this scatheless spokesman of "martyrs," abounds in evidences plain enough to those accustomed to Irish oratory of his consciousness that the game is up. Strong and steady government in Ireland is doing its work. We shall doubtless never quite put a stop to such displays of the national spirit as that of the Kerry Moonlighters who have just ripped up the stomach of an unpopular bog-ranger's horse. But, if this brutal savagery of Irish agrarianism will always be in a great measure beyond our power to check, we can deal, and we are dealing, effectually with all the other disorderly elements of Irish society which are not quite so barbarous as to be beyond the reach of ordinary deterrents.

CRICKET.

THE cricket of the week, despite some amusing incidents, has not been very absorbing. If anybody knew where Leyton is, doubtless there would have been a larger gathering to see Oxford Past and Present play the Australians. But the spirit of the explorer is damped within him when he hears that, if he would view fair Leyton aright, he must first wend his way to Liverpool Street. Whosoever arrived at the scene beheld a pretty good match, though Oxford was not adequately represented. Mr. J. G. WALKER was at Lord's, Mr. WEBBE was at Lord's, Mr. KEY was playing for Surrey against Sussex. On the other hand, Mr. LESLIE came forward, and showed that he had not forgotten his swashing blow, which Marlborough boys dreaded of old; and that he had given up playing back at a half-volley. Mr. COLLINS was tried, too; we have once or twice urged this course on various administrations. Mr. COLLINS, who is a fast left-hand bowler of a formidable character, struck terror and inspired respect among the Colonists in the first innings. In the second, for some reason, he could no longer do so, and Australia won easily enough, Mr. NEPEAN being the most successful bowler. Six wickets in the first innings was a very good bag for Mr. COLLINS. Mr. BONNOR's sixty-five, steadily played for, was the best contribution in the Australian 176. That consistent walker, Mr. RASHLEIGH, made 33 for Oxford; Mr. BUCKLAND added 63; but it was the scoring of Mr. LESLIE, Mr. CROOME (66), and Mr. COLLINS (13), at the end of the Oxford innings, that gave them a semblance of a chance for victory, with 241. But Mr. McDONNELL rallied in the Australian second innings; Mr. BANNERMAN and Mr. TROTT kept even company with him; Mr. EDWARDS added an unlooked for 50; and Mr. FERRIS played a most useful bowler's innings. On a fatigued wicket, and against a bowler like Mr. TURNER, Oxford could not expect to get 221. Mr. WATSON's 26 and Mr. PHILIPSON's 29 were pretty scores, and Mr. WATSON's may perhaps get him his colours. But Lord GEORGE SCOTT did himself no justice, Mr. LESLIE failed, and only Mr. COCHRANE deserves a word of praise for his gallant 14 not out. He was not out in both innings, but it was not his day as a bowler. Indeed, no two Oxford bowlers seem ever to be at their best on the same occasion; and you never can tell which of them will chance to be in form. The Australians were the stronger eleven, chiefly by virtue of their bowling, and won on their merits. With Mr. WEBBE, Mr. KEY, and Mr. WALKER in place of three of the selected team, we think they would have been defeated.

The Gloucestershire and Middlesex match was full of moving chances, especially when Mr. W. G. GRACE was bowling to WEST for catches, and WEST gave them "as rich "men give that care not for their gifts," and the Gloucestershire fielders consistently dropped them. WEST's 83 was a most lively exhibition of hard hitting; and, if he gave chances, why he deliberately and successfully chose to chance it. On the other hand, Mr. J. G. WALKER's 94 was a classically beautiful performance. Mr. WALKER's cuts are easily to be recognized, so clean and brilliant are they. Mr. P. J. DE PARAVICINI contributed a valuable 42; and his handling was, as a rule, excellent. With a score of 301 Middlesex seemed likely to do well. Dr. E. M. GRACE, however, hit BURTON's first ball to the ropes with insolent familiarity, and seemed to make very light of the bowling in general. To the amazement and joy of mankind, Mr. WEBBE bowled Mr. W. G. GRACE for 25, then his elder brother obstructed with his leg a ball of Mr. ROBERTSON's, and so the GRACES were out for 60. But, alas! the next wicket, PAINTER's, fell for 302. PAINTER made 130, and Mr. TROUP stayed in with him through an innings which appeared interminable. Mr. BUSH, too, remained long at the wickets; indeed, almost everybody scored off the weary bowlers. Gloucestershire amassed 400, and Middlesex went in on a fatigued wicket which kicked fearfully and in a very sallow light. Mr. WALKER was a failure. Mr. WEBBE cut brilliantly and made a hit for 9. Five were run, when Mr. W. G. GRACE threw in "as some wits "poet when he works without a conscience or an ear." The ball reached the ropes among exclamations [illegible] did not [illegible]. Except Mr. SCOTT, nobody did [illegible] help Mr. [illegible], and he was run out in a [illegible] ner. Gloucestershire had only 30 runs to make to win; they sacrificed [illegible] Mr. RADCLIFFE and Mr. [illegible]. The victories of Notts over Sussex and of Yorkshire over Derbyshire could surprise none and interest few. Surrey is the champion county, so far, and Gloucestershire next; but Notts will probably assert herself before the end of these things.

MORE CONTRADICTION.

IT is very tiresome to have to listen to, and also, as we beg to assure everybody, to have to keep on repeating the same thing, but if it is always the same thing there is no resource. Unhappily this continues to be the case with those burning questions—the strength of the navy and the state of the national defences. Within the last ten days they have been discussed here and there in a more or less authoritative way, and one thing only has been demonstrated by all the talk. From the conversation in the House of Lords about the naval station at Esquimalt on to Sir A. HOOD's evidence before the Committee of the Commons one old piece of knowledge has been proved for the twentieth time. It is that the experts are all hopelessly at sixes and sevens. As long as this is the case, discussions on the state of the navy and the defences can only lead to an endless war of words, which leaves the outsider in a state of mere confusion of mind and the experts more obstinately convinced of the value of their various opinions than before. The only possible way of escape from the wrangle has been pointed out here so often that a man would die of weariness to insist on it again. The more supportable course is to detail the proofs which have at least some superficial appearance of variety.

There is the question of the value of Esquimalt as a naval station. Lord SUDELEY, speaking with personal knowledge, assured the Upper House that Burrard Inlet was far superior for the purpose—a better anchorage, better covered, less accessible to any enemy but one, and delightfully easy to defend. This looked like a string of reasons for sending out the guns which are (strange to say) ready for Esquimalt to Burrard Inlet. Then Lord ELPHINSTONE arose, and, speaking with equal authority, pointed out that though the Inlet is a splendid land-locked harbour when you are in it, there is a periodical difficulty about getting in, no small defect in a naval station. Further, it would be exceedingly liable to attack from the United States. We do not contemplate a war with our American cousins, but the thing is humanly possible, and so we ought to avoid the danger unless it were at the expense of incurring a greater—which Lord ELPHINSTONE does not think we shall do by sticking to Esquimalt. Now what is the course to be taken? "One "officer," says Lord ELPHINSTONE, "whose opinion carried "great weight, would tell you that Burrard Inlet was "the proper place for a naval station; another officer "of equal authority would tell you that the Inlet was "little better than a rat trap." Just so, and as long as the experts keep knocking one another's cases about one another's ears in this fashion of what avail is it to tell us that they must be implicitly trusted? Then there is the great sudden invasion business. Lord GEORGE HAMILTON has been reasonably well scolded for what he said on the subject last Monday, or, indeed, for saying anything at all; but, as he was asked a direct question, we fail to see what course was open to him except to answer it. Besides it is rather too easy a style of argument, this practice of talking about red herrings instead of tackling the facts. Put briefly, what Lord GEORGE had to say about the ADJUTANT-GENERAL's 150,000 tons was, that they were tons net, and not tons gross. In other words, Lord WOLSELEY seemed to contemplate the arrival of an enemy in ships which contain neither boilers, nor engines, nor hatchways, nor skylights, nor steering gear, all of which things are included in the gross tonnage. But a ship which has none of them is about as fit to cross the Channel as the Château de Coucy; so we must calculate the transports of our invaders in tons gross. When that is done, and allowance is made for horses (4 tons net apiece for 30,000), it is found that the ADJUTANT-GENERAL's 150,000 [illegible] run up to something not far short of Lord GEORGE HAMILTON's [illegible],000 tons. Here, again, the anxious Briton finds himself in the position of Captain [illegible]. How happy could he be with either [illegible]—but the difficulty is just to know [illegible] POLLY, or the [illegible] prevailing [illegible] be quoted [illegible] on Naval Estimates. Sir [illegible] HOOD, the First Sea Lord, gave it as his opinion that we are doing fairly well in battle ships, provided we do not stop altogether, but go steadily on; that the navy is well organized and ready for service; and, that, although it ought to be strengthened, six cruisers will do. We are going down a descending scale. First it was a hundred and eighty-five cruisers, then it was twenty-five, now it is six. Admiral HORNBY, Lord CHARLES BERESFORD, and Sir ARTHUR HOOD, all distinguished officers, are severally responsible for these widely varying estimates. Out of such differences nothing can come but mere angry contradiction. It is true that all three are agreed that the navy must be strengthened; but as long as they differ over the how and the when and the to what extent it is not possible that their agreement can counterbalance their mutual contradictions. Therefore once more the first thing to be done is to secure at least some approach to unanimity among the doctors, and then we shall begin to know where we are.

MR GLADSTONE'S ELECTIONEERING TACTICS.

IT is very difficult to say what argument, addressed to the reason or conscience, is likely to weigh with people who are still capable of believing in, and being influenced by, Mr. GLADSTONE. But, if a shameless self-exposure of sophistry has any effect on their understandings, or a deliberate persistence in false representations gives any shock to their moral sense, we should say that Mr. GLADSTONE'S letter to Lord HARTINGTON—or rather to the Ayrshire electors, for it appears that it was published in the newspapers even before its nominal addressee had seen it—would lose many votes to his party in that constituency. In some equally gross cases of controversial dishonesty the distinguished offender has cleverly contrived to conceal the act which he was committing behind a mystifying cloud of words. Mr. GLADSTONE, however, has of late years become less cunning, or more careless, in these matters than he was wont to be, and the exact nature of the manœuvre to which he has descended for electioneering purposes in the present instance must be clear to the dullest electoral intelligence in Ayrshire.

The point, indeed, on which this last Gladstonianism turns is one which the Scottish mind is particularly well able to appreciate. Everybody knows what a Scotchman means by the "sentiment of nationality"; or, if there is anybody who does not know, and who wants enlightenment, we recommend him to communicate with the Duke of ARGYLL, and request that typical Scotch patriot to describe his emotion when he last stood on the field of Bannockburn. Everybody knows, we say, or ought to know, that the sentiment of nationality is proudly cherished and highly prized by the Scot, and that he would look with the utmost distrust and jealousy on any politician whom he suspected of a desire to extinguish this sentiment or even to deny it, whether in this case of Scotchmen or, by parity of reasoning, Irishmen, its lawful gratifications. This being so, it was of course a stroke of tactics no less telling than unscrupulous to represent Lord HARTINGTON to the Ayrshire electors as having threatened to withhold local government from Ireland until Irishmen had "renounced their national "aspirations"; and, being a stroke of tactics no less telling than unscrupulous to represent Lord HARTINGTON thus, the former consideration was as sure to induce Mr. GLADSTONE to do it as the latter was certain not to restrain him. To this misrepresentation it was of course necessary to reply, as he did, by pointing out that he had never made any declaration of the kind imputed to him, and remarking that "it would be more satisfactory if Mr. GLADSTONE "would quote my own declarations in my own words." And if Mr. GLADSTONE were not Mr. GLADSTONE, so no doubt it would be. But Mr. GLADSTONE being Mr. GLADSTONE, it is not any more satisfactory at all to the victim of his misrepresentation. For Mr. GLADSTONE, with the desperate courage he always displays when "cornered," politely complies with Lord HARTINGTON'S suggestion, quotes his declaration in his own words, selects as many of those words as favour the misrepresentation of his views, rejects all those which expose its fraudulent perversion of the facts, and repeats the falsehood again in more precise and definite language than before. "I believe," Lord HARTINGTON had said, "that it is the first duty of Parlia"ment to assert, and, if necessary, to assert again and again, "that the recognition of Irish nationality as the basis of "Irish government it will have nothing to do with. When "that idea is definitely removed, and the Irish have ascer"tained that this people will not grant it, then, and not "till then, will the ground be cleared for the construction "of a plan by which the same local liberties and local "government shall be extended to them as Scotland, "Wales, and England ask for themselves." In other words, so long as the national aspirations of the Irish people include an aspiration after a Parliament in Dublin, with an Executive responsible to it, Lord HARTINGTON will countenance no such proposal to extend local government in Ireland; but they may aspire to anything else they please. Mr. GLADSTONE, however, in the face of this enormous qualification of his former statement of Lord HARTINGTON'S views, still adheres to his original account of them. Nay; he goes further, and declares that the postponement of local government reform in Ireland is really denial, because it is "postponement until after the "fulfilment of an impossible condition." And this he regards as likely to help the Gladstonian candidate for Ayrshire. We can only hope, for the credit of the electors, that he is utterly mistaken.

MR. KING'S MOTION.

IT is only too probable that Mr. KING was quite right in supposing that his plea in favour of the Uncovenanted Civil Service of India would prove unattractive to many members of the House of Commons. On the whole, he was lucky in securing the support of 55 members; and, if 166 voted against him, the cause of the disaster is not far to seek. It would be strange if a Ministry with a large majority could not get overwhelming support against anything so unpopular as a demand for a little money to remedy a not very clearly understood Indian service grievance. No doubt it is the duty of every right-minded—that is to say, patriotic—Englishman to understand something about the government of India. We are told that we ought to do so; but, if England expects every man to do this duty, England is most egregiously mistaken. In Parliament or out of it, what percentage of Englishmen have gone so far as even to read that most readable book, Colonel CHESNEY'S Indian Polity? Let no man inquire out of pure regard for his countrymen. It is only too probable that, if the first Club smoking-room could be examined, very few of the gentlemen there would be found to have much meaning to attach to those mysterious words, Covenanted and Uncovenanted Service, Regulation and Non-regulation Province. Still less would they have any notions of their own—or secondhand ones either—about those complicated questions of scale of pay, rights to furlough, promotion, and retiring allowances, which are so very serious to Englishmen serving in India. Therefore it is not wonderful that the member for Hull had, as it were, to preach in the desert; and, we repeat, he may be thankful for his fifty-five supporters.

Nevertheless, Mr. KING'S case is not so difficult to understand when it is looked at as a question of fair play and justice. Practically, it amounts to this—why should JOHN, who goes into the Indian Civil Service, be better treated as to furlough and pension than his cousin THOMAS, who goes into the Public Works Department from Cooper's Hill? Time and space preclude any statement of the history of the Covenanted and Uncovenanted Services. Let it be enough that they are branches of the Indian Administration, and that the first is better treated than the second. The Covenanted—that is, the Indian Civil Service—have six years' furlough in twenty-five years' service, and their pensions are paid in sterling. The Uncovenanted—(namely, the Woods and Forests, Public Works, Opium, and Education Departments), except where special exceptions are made, have only about two years' furlough in thirty years, and their pensions are paid in rupees. It is characteristic of the curious complications of our public offices that Uncovenanted servants who happened to be drawing five hundred rupees a month in 1876 "were ad"mitted to the benefits of Schedule A." What these are it would be long to say. Enough that they are comparatively nice, and that other gentlemen in the same service promoted to the same posts later on have not been allowed to share in them. The difference in the furlough allowed is particularly mysterious. Furlough is supposed to be given as necessary for health; but, if that is so, it follows that either the Covenanted servants get too much or the Uncovenanted too little. Here is surely what our Radical friends denounce as an anomaly. The great grievance of the Uncovenanted Service, however, arises from that awful and mysterious visitation called the depreciation of the rupee. The Covenanted and military officers receive their pensions in sterling. The Uncovenanted are paid in rupees. Practically this means that an officer who retires on 5,000 rupees a year, instead of receiving 500*l.* or so (which is what he was promised thirty years ago), receives about 330*l.*, since the rupee has gone down from 2*s.* to 1*s.* 4*d.* Now 330*l.* is a miserable sum to retire on after thirty years of service in India. To say, as Mr. COURTNEY did, that the purchasing power of the sovereign is greater than it was is a hollow mockery; for in that case the Covenanted and military officers who are paid their pensions in sterling are gaining, which cannot be soothing to the feelings of the Uncovenanted officers. No doubt Mr. KING's case was made difficult for him by the fact that the Indian Government always said it would pay the Uncovenanted servants' pensions in rupees at the current rate of exchange, and it is doing so. Therefore, it is technically in the right. But when the promise was made the rupee was at 2*s.*; when it seemed likely to go higher the Indian Government refused to pay beyond that limit; now that it is falling the Uncovenanted servants are kept to the letter of their bond, in the spirit of a very SHYLOCK. This is to keep a promise to the ear and break it to the hope in a manner not quite worthy of a great Government. But, putting all questions of justice aside, there is another consideration which may be recommended to the India Office. It is this—Government has already made some parts of the Uncovenanted Service so unpopular that candidates could not be got for vacancies. Then it has been compelled to go into the market and tempt men in—a practice which does not work for economy, or the interests of the Indian taxpayer, or any good thing. It may do as much again, and have to spend far more than the 20,000*l.* a year or so (hardly the cost of a Viceregal progress) which would be enough now to remove a serious grievance. If the India Office has any doubt on the subject, let it go to the Admiralty and War Office, and get the history of the Naval and Military Medical Departments. The answers it will obtain will be instructive.

OTHER PEOPLE'S HOUSES.

AS soon as spring begins to merge into summer, and indeed throughout the whole of the summer and early autumn months, a constant flow of inter-migration sets in among a large class of persons who, from various motives, whether of economy, desire for change, or habitual practice which has become almost a necessity, are intent upon a temporary change of residence. The country squire leaves his spacious mansion and park, and establishes himself and his belongings in a poky and cramped house in some more or less fashionable quarter of London, the owner of which gladly seizes the opportunity of a few months in the country, with the additional prospect of putting something in his pocket by the transaction; the fortunate proprietor of an attractive villa on the Thames drives a hard bargain with a wealthy Londoner, and goes off to the Land's End or the West coast of Scotland; the well-to-do country rector has no great difficulty in getting a tenant for the vicarage while he takes his holiday at the seaside or on the Continent; and, in short, a kind of "general post" is going on all over the country.

The circumstances attending a movement of this kind may, of course, be widely different in each case. In one instance the transaction may represent a distinct financial gain, while in another it may entail a considerable sacrifice, to be regarded as a means to an end, and only to be justified by rigid economy in other quarters. But in the majority of cases the move is effected with some idea of pleasure rather than of duty, and as such is looked forward to as an agreeable variation on the ordinary course of domestic life. This is perhaps most conspicuous in the case of country people who come up to London for a short time during the season. It is wonderful what sacrifices will sometimes be made in order to attain this object. At a time of year when Nature is at her loveliest, when their flowers are blooming, their young asparagus approaching perfection, and rural life is becoming really enjoyable, they will leave their beautiful country homes without a sigh, and embark upon the uncertainties of a stuffy and expensive house in London, to become infinitesimal items in the feverish mob of strivers after the unattainable, and to learn by sad experience that there are few hopes less certain of realization than that of finding pleasure in the London season. Those, in fact, who in their country homes are accustomed to every comfort, if not every luxury, will cheerfully put up with all kinds of inconveniences and shortcomings in the way of accommodation to secure a habitable residence in a fairly fashionable quarter of the metropolis; and, as far as actual comfort and physical enjoyment go, the Londoner who migrates to the country gets incomparably more for his money than the countryman who comes to London. Any change of surroundings, however, unless attended by such circumstances as to render it a painful or distressing one, is sure to be more or less beneficial. There is nothing so deteriorating, both to mind and body, as monotony; and, even if the change be accompanied by a certain amount of discomfort in the first instance, the chances are that in the end the general result will be satisfactory. This theory may, of course, be carried a great deal too far; and the restless temperament that is always seeking after change will end by being satisfied with nothing. But to the average stay-at-home individual, whose ordinary existence is of a somewhat humdrum order, a change of any sort comes with the effect of a salutary tonic or alterative. No medicine, in fact, is so powerful or efficacious in certain cases as a thorough change; and, if it were only possible to bring this about at regular intervals, the existence of many a toil-worn and custom-ridden slave of civilization would be a very different thing from what it is at present.

There is undoubtedly, apart from the mere zest and excitement accompanying a change of residence of any sort, unless decidedly for the worse, a good deal of interesting experience to be got out of a temporary sojourn in another person's house. The female mind is perhaps peculiarly susceptible to this form of emotion. We are conventionally led to suppose that the average woman is never so happy as when she is engaged in investigating the internal economy of a friend's establishment, and that with this idea in view, the readiest way of ingratiating yourself with a female visitor is to invite her to inspect your house from top to bottom. This is probably an exaggerated view of the case; but it is reasonable to suppose that the theory is not altogether without foundation; and assuming even a moderate degree of curiosity on this subject to be innate in the feminine mind, it is obvious that the absolute possession for a certain time of a stranger's house and all that it contains must offer attractions of no ordinary kind. Not that this particular form of curiosity is necessarily confined to the fair sex. Stories have been told of amiable and generally harmless monomaniacs of the male persuasion who have devoted their lives to the examining of old books, with the idea of finding concealed bank-notes, or to the manipulating of old pieces of furniture, with a view to the discovery of treasures concealed in secret drawers; and to such explorers of the past the temporary acquisition of an old house and its appurtenances must be a matter of the most lively interest. And although the presence of a ghost on the premises is not usually put forward by a house-agent as a special feature among the attractions of an eligible family residence, there are plenty of psychological enthusiasts who would hail with delight the prospect of a sojourn in a haunted house where the ghosts were not too unpleasantly demonstrative, and where their researches into the night side of nature might be conducted under sufficiently exciting, but not too disturbing, conditions. It is not necessary, however, to be a specialist in secret drawers or other occult investigations to find plenty of interest in other people's surroundings which have for the time being become one's own. The access to another man's library, for instance, provided the books, as is sometimes the case, are not carefully locked up, would by many persons be looked upon as alone worth the rent of the house; and even to those whose literary tastes do not extend beyond works of fiction or the general produce of the railway bookstall, it is interesting to find how far another person's ideas coincide with your own, and very likely to have a chance of lighting on something entirely new. This applies with equal force to the garden, the stables, the kitchen, and, indeed, to every department of the establishment; for no matter how correct any previously formed theories may be as to the internal economy of a house, it would be strange if the occupation for some weeks or months of the hearth of another did not suggest some new ideas, or, at any rate, some better development of existing arrangements at home. It is quite likely, indeed, assuming that your own and your hired house are in a general way pretty much on a level, that everything may at first appear very much better and more desirable than what you have hitherto been accustomed to. The pattern of the wall-paper will seem in better taste, the chintzes fresher and brighter, the arm-chairs more comfortable, and the rooms more generally liveable. In short, it is by no means impossible that for the moment you may be put altogether out of conceit with your own house, and inclined to wonder how you can have lived in it so long without finding out its deficiencies. This feeling, however, will by degrees wear off, and by the time the tenancy has come to an end it is quite probable that the tenant will be only too glad to get back to his own house. But he will have got hold of some new ideas, the carrying out of which will supply him with some interesting and—provided he or his female belongings are not tempted to launch out into reckless extravagance in emulation of what they have seen—sufficiently harmless occupation; and an improvement suggested by some device or arrangement, perhaps trifling or incomplete in itself, in another person's house, may make all the difference hereafter in his own.

The circumstances attending the letting of a house may, as a [illegible] prosaic enough in themselves. [illegible] with the attributes of a [illegible] of this kind has before now [illegible] the novelist. For, [illegible] in the way of [illegible] that the bringing together of two parties in such a manner may result in an intimacy of a much more interesting kind, and an acquaintance commenced through the commonplace medium of a house-agent may develop into a life-long friendship, if nothing further.

THE REAL PEASANT'S FRIEND.

THERE are not a few tempting subjects this week for the political Democritus. Mr. Gladstone calmly affirming the thing that has been several times proved to be not, as an electioneering device is agreeable, but perhaps too serious. The Parnellite dinner is good and particularly interesting, viewed in the light of the contention of the Daily News that the dinner at the Café Royal was "triumphant," and in some way or other finally proved the immaculateness of the Irish Parliamentary party. On this a person, signing himself "An Old Twaddler," sends us an epigram which seems, at any rate, well-meant twaddle:—

(IRISH PARLIAMENTARY PARTY loquitur.)

You talk of "Parnellism and Crime,"
You call us "scoundrel," "traitor," "sinner."
Answer: (in reason and in rhyme Complete) "We ask ourselves to dinner!"

But, for our part, we have from the beginning of the week kept our eye on a pleasing letter to Sir Balthasar Foster from Sir William Harcourt, from the descendant of British Kings to the namesake of one at least of Their Majesties of Cologne. This has all the more interest that Sir William does not write much now; the pen (an instrument wherein he was once not unskilled) having been given up almost wholly for the tongue. Perhaps, on the Baconian principle, this may account for the little defects of "exactness" observable of late in Sir William, but that shall be as it may. And, being ourselves extremely generous, we shall point out that, though the subject of the letter is the Allotments Bill, Sir William's omission to apologize to Mr. Pitt-Lewis in connexion with that matter must not, owing to the date of the letter, be charged against him. The letter, indeed, was not published till some days after the member for the Barnstaple division had pointed out that Sir William Harcourt, with the chivalry natural to a person of many quarterings, had accused a sick man of running away. But apparently Sir Balthasar had not been able to resign himself steadily to the pain of parting, for public use, with the letter of Sir William, his brother-in-arms, for it is dated six days earlier.

It begins with a congratulation to "my dear Foster" on the Allotments Association over which he "so worthily presides." Now, as is well known, there are those who charge "my dear Foster" with playing but a cuckoo's part towards poor Mr. Jesse Collings. "My dear Foster" and the others were all sons of Jesse; Mr. Collings fostered them, just as now Sir Balthasar does. "Balthasar sits in Jesse's chair," and some people wonder how on earth he came there. Sir William does not wonder—indeed, there is a theory that wonder is the appanage (Sir William knows that word) of vulgar souls only. But he congratulates Sir Balthasar on the "exposure" of the "new-born" Labourers' League which has been recently "founded" at Birmingham, and which has been compelled to "hoist its true colours" at Willis's Rooms. God bless us; but this is a derangement of epitaphs! We have all heard of "exposing new-born" children, but the practice is not generally held to be the subject of congratulation. And then it seems that the new-born infant which was thus cruelly treated by Sir Balthasar, and whose sufferings are gloated over by Sir William, was also "founded" (the scholiast suggests "found" or "foundlinged"). The usual practice of exposed infants is to cry, but this one didn't; it "hoisted its true colours"! "I mark three hundred on the head of Turk, and I make metaphors which are consecutive," boasted a great French poet. Far be it from us to set any limits to the prowess of Sir William with his fist; but the sequence of his metaphor certainly seems to fall short of Gautier's. Still, let us return to the unfortunately naked new-born child which was exposed and thereupon hoisted its true colours in the rooms of Willis. Some good easy people, it seems, might have been disposed to hope that this latter-day "Baby Bunting," this infant hoisting flags, was "established to pursue, under rival auspices, the same object which had been constantly and successfully pursued in the past by the Allotments Association." Ah! but it's the turn of phrase Sir William has and the fine, fresh language, entirely! He can even spare another sentence of the same; but then it seems he "doubted." He fixed his eagle eye on Mr. Collings, and that eye at once (the style is catching) smelt a rat. "His suspicions was aroused," as the members of a force over which he once presided with much grace are wont to say. Mr. Collings was suspicious, the "Birmingham hotel" in which the poor Baby Bunting was born was suspicious, and he could not discover the presence of "the eminent and recalcitrant Vice-Presidents." In fact, it would seem that Sir William said to himself, with the acuteness of his collateral ancestor when he discovered the Gunpowder Plot, "There is something wrong." And he was, it is unnecessary to say, right. A week or two later the "eminent and recalcitrant Vice-Presidents" "declined to support their President's Bill." The provisions, it seems, of the Small Holdings Bill were vital; their object was "to re-create in England an independent peasantry," such as, or if possible even happier than, that among which, as Sir William once mentioned in an interesting speech, he spent his own guileless youth at Bolton Percy. The eminent and recalcitrant Vice-Presidents would not support the Bill, and Sir William, no longer suspicious, was now only "curious." He wanted to know how they would excuse themselves. And as he passed from suspicion to curiosity, so he has now passed from curiosity to consternation. It is the "hardihood of assertion" of "so candid a man" as Lord Hartington which is making Sir William despair of mankind. He reflects that Lord Hartington is "in an awkward situation" (how different from that of some years ago when, Achilles sulking in his tent, the temporary Agamemnon of the Liberal party had for Ulysses and Nestor rolled into one a certain person who shall be nameless!) Such a situation requires "courage." But whether it requires more courage than Sir William himself shows may be doubtful. For, quoting Lord Hartington's reference to the prospectus of the Labourers' League as containing what Lord Hartington does support, and ignoring the fact that that prospectus contains nothing about the Small Holdings Bill, he goes on to say that Lord Hartington will not support the textual things which Lord Hartington has just said he will support. And there is still more courage in an awkward situation to follow. "To such depths of absurdity can sensible men be brought who have become accomplices in a sham and have to apologize for their participation in an imposture." Ah! what a noble sentence! What a moralist to have among us! What an admirable description of certain persons, let us say, who imprison, denounce, coerce Irishmen in one year, and, while these Irishmen pursue exactly the same ends by exactly the same means, glorify, embrace, and extol them the next! And then Sir William returns from Lord Hartington (left in the depths of absurdity, but full of courage) to Mr. Collings, who seems to exercise on this worthy knight a strangely disturbing effect. Mr. Collings and "his manœuvres" have been "found out." He has "sacrificed the labourer's cause." He has made a Labourers' League which is only a "subordinate machinery" (for what does the reader who is not experienced in the reasoning of Colney Hatch guess?) "for the coercion of the Irish peasant and the maintenance of the extortions" (that is, the rent declared fair by the Courts which Sir William helped to establish) "of Irish landlords." Mr. Collings's name is the "favourite aversion" of agricultural labourers, who, no doubt, have come in a body to Sir William and told him so, for which he compliments them by saying that they are a shrewd class.

We think they are; though too often, by no fault of their own, a backward, a suspicious, and an ill-informed one; and we are quite sure that, if Unionist agents took half the pains that is taken by Separatists to put the truth before them, it is not Mr. Collings who would be their "favourite aversion," or the "eminent and recalcitrant Vice-Presidents" in whom they would see "manœuvrers." Mr. Jesse Collings has at no time been the very wisest of politicians, but he has been a transparently honest one. His sole hope of office, and of carrying out his own pet schemes, lay in hanging on to Mr. Gladstone, and he refused so to hang on because Mr. Gladstone turned his coat, and he, Mr. Collings, declined to turn his. That is the kind of thing which can be made very plain to that shrewd class the agricultural labourer. They can also be taught to ask whether there is any record of similar conduct on the part of Sir William Harcourt. And when they get an answer to that question they may be taught to ask, further, whether there is any record in Sir William's career of conduct exactly the opposite—of his giving up, not office for opinions, but opinions for office. And to that question at least they will not have much difficulty in getting an answer—an answer referring to events of pretty recent date. They may not find with such a production as the letter to Sir Balthasar the same faults that more sophisticated persons may find. The singularly mixed infants which are new-born, are exposed, and hoist their colours all in what we trust we may without frivolity call the twinkling of a bedpost, may not shock their literary sense; and penny-a-lining about "promoting under rival auspices" and "delusions conspicuously dispelled" may seem to them quite the proper thing for what a recent heroine in an American novel calls "a piece in the newspaper." For all the ins and outs of Lord Hartington's votes and Mr. Collings's Bills, and what not, they will have very little comprehension and not much interest, wherein we blame them not. They will not, being a kind of folk not given to sarcasm or sneer, read with quite such relish as we read just after the new-born child and the auspices, and so forth, the sentence which we have quoted once, but which we must quote once more. "To such depths of absurdity can sensible men be brought [we have heard, and, indeed, we know, that Sir William was once a sensible man] who have become accomplices in a sham, and have to apologize for their participation in an imposture." Nor will they look forward with such lively pleasure as we do to the fulfilment of the last clause, and to hearing Sir William some day apologize in his own peculiar way for participation in the imposture of Gladstonian Home Rule. They will not do all this. But they will do, if they are a shrewd class, two things. They will know that Mr. Collings has had no motive for being, and no record of having been, anything but their sincere, if not always their wisest, friend, and they will ask for any similar proof of the friendship of Sir William Harcourt.

SCULPTURE AT THE SMALLER GALLERIES.

IN our article on the sculpture of the year we were so long attracted by the copious display at the Royal Academy that we had no space left to go beyond it. But the show is fairly good at the New Gallery, and sculpture elsewhere deserves some mention also. It is proper, therefore, that we should add a supplement to our last week's criticism.

The Central Hall of the New Gallery is very happily adapted for the exhibition of works of sculpture; and, no doubt, when next year there shall have been a longer time to select works of plastic art, we may expect a representative collection. This year, with some things that are bad, and more that are mediocre, there are several pieces which deserve great praise, while some of these are by sculptors not represented in the Royal Academy. It is to the New Gallery that we must go this year to see Mr. Bates, Mr. Swynnerton, and Mr. Roscoe Mullins. A sort of prominence or place of honour is given to the "Young Satyr" (310) of Mr. A. Legros. This is a marble sketch, over which some of our contemporaries have raved. We have always sought, while admitting Mr. Legros's great gifts in more than one branch of art, to deprecate the heedless flattery that greets him as a master in all. This satyr is fleshy, we admit, but we can admit no more. What Mr. Legros might possibly make of this figure, if he would condescend to finish it, we know not. At present it is in the peculiar half-baked condition in which a work should not be seen even by a fellow-artist, least of all by the public. We turn away with pleasure to Mr. Swynnerton's ambitious and successful fountain, "Love's Chalice" (336). This sculptor has done nothing before so promising or so important as this. A nude Eros presents his hollowed hands, full of cold water, to a draped maiden, who stoops to drink. The figures are in the round, against an architectural entablature of architrave and frieze. The sculptor's part seems to us happier than the architect's. The figures are well modelled, and charmingly posed; only the face of Love is most unfortunate; he positively carries the resemblance of an elderly comic actor. Mr. Swynnerton, we hope, will remodel this head. To the right of Mr. Swynnerton's fountain stands a statuette of Mr. Thornycroft's well-known statue, "The Mower" (334), of delightful size. This little work, executed in bronze, would be a most appropriate ornament for a modern drawing-room, and we hope Mr. Thornycroft will be persuaded to publish it at this size. Mr. R. Stephens has a pretty statuette (339). With Mr. Mullins's "The First Dip" (327), a group of two nude girls carrying a child between them, we are not satisfied. The action naturally flings the principal figures apart, and divides the composition where it should be drawn together.

The New Gallery is strong in works in relief. Mr. Harry Bates sends two of his beautiful panels. "Peace" (317) represents a naked and evidently vainglorious poet strolling along with his lyre, while a strictly-draped singing woman marches beside him, and waves a loose chaplet of bays; "War" shows the back of a warrior, who leaves his wife and child behind him. There is considerable evidence at the New Gallery of the effect which the Tuscan sculpture seen in London last winter has had on our sculptors. Mr. G. G. Frampton has been most happily inspired by it in his austere female head in very low relief (348); Mr. Hamo Thornycroft, on the other hand, has not been by any means so lucky in his similar head (335). The New Gallery is rich in medals and medallions. Mr. Thornycroft makes up for the failure we have just chronicled by his extremely happy and picturesque circular medals of his wife and son (349, 351), and the work of the Society of Medallists, generally, as seen in a succession of cases, is well worth study. We ought to mention the names of Mr. Onslow Ford, Mr. Poynter, and Sir Arthur Clay.

In iconic sculpture there is not much of importance in the New Gallery. Mr. Ford's sketch of "MacLure Hamilton" (344) is superbly spirited. The best of some rather coarse and exaggerated busts by Mr. Dressler is the "John Ruskin" (320). The veteran of British sculptors, who has not exhibited for several years, Mrs. Mary Thornycroft, comes forward with two heads of children (324, 325), in that fresh and happy style which made her work so popular forty years ago. Mr. Mullins sends a good portrait statuette (328) and an interesting bust of a girl (329). We must not omit to mention Mr. E. Millais's "Typical Basset-hound" (309), which is excellently odd.

The Grosvenor Gallery contains many bad things, and a few good things, which are not all new. We like Mr. Mullins's "Conquerors," but we are tired of praising it. Mr. Pepice Brown's "Artillery Sentry" (373) is less petty in style, and rather more real, than any of his military statuettes which we have seen before. Mr. T. Nelson MacLean is not up to his usual mark this year, nor is Miss Henrietta Montalba. On the whole, the best piece of sculpture at the Grosvenor is a "Boy's Head" ([illegible]), by Mr. Mullins. At the New English Art Club, among all the extraordinary incongruous pictures, Mr. J. Stirling Lee, whom we miss from the other exhibitions, refreshes the weary critic with two beautiful works—a bronze head, and a design in low relief, also in bronze.

MILITARY CYCLING.

A NEW step [illegible] the progress of developing the [illegible] military cycling [illegible] marked on Friday [illegible] and discussion, of [illegible] interest, at the Royal United Service Institution. The lecturer, Lieutenant-Colonel Savile, is [illegible] the only man who could have given a consecutive history of what has been done in this direction in this country and abroad up to the present time. He has had access to the sources of information on all subjects connected with foreign armies, he has been personally in command on the two occasions when cyclists have been tried on an extended scale in England, he has been President of the Committee appointed to consider many important points in connexion with military cycling, he has been for many years himself a keen cyclist, and, lastly, he brings to bear on the subject the results of those studies which have placed him in the position of Professor of Tactics at the Royal Military College. Under these circumstances his lecture could not fail to be of great value.

It is, perhaps, characteristic of how we do things here that, although we have notoriously a deficiency of horses, and notoriously sufficiency of cycles, we should have been the last of the Great Powers (excluding Russia) to take to using the latter. Cycles do not appear to have ever been recommended even in a letter to the papers here for conveying information and orders until they had been actually so used for six years in Italy. Austria, France, and Germany followed suit, and in all these countries the employment of cyclists for these limited purposes has ceased to present any novelty. If, however, we have been behindhand from this point of view, we have been beforehand from another. First of all, of course, there is the inevitable committee. We usually are beforehand with committees; although no doubt in this case there is some excuse for the delegation of duties, as even the versatile Adjutant-General does not, we believe, ride a bicycle. We look forward, however, to the next edition of The Soldier's Pocket Book to find the complete statistics of all subjects connected with military cycling. But, secondly, we find that there is the recognition of the distinct aim of cyclists to assist cavalry in their work of obtaining information and giving security to an army in the field. This point was tersely put by Colonel Savile when he said:—"The cycle is now recognized by military authorities as one of the means of transport of that mobile infantry which may possibly in the future supply the fire power so long needed by cavalry when employed far in advance of the marching columns of an army." This sentence was perhaps the only one which gave rise to adverse criticism, for it was seized upon by Colonel Lonsdale Hale as a point of attack. Perhaps he regarded it as the key of the position. In any case, however, this position was impregnable. For not only did Colonel Savile point out with obvious force that, unless the cycle was recognized as a means of transport for mobile infantry, the War Office would not have sanctioned the formation of regular and volunteer cyclist bodies, nor appointed a Committee to report on many important questions in connexion with their employment, but Lord Wolseley, as Chairman, took exception to Colonel Hale's line of argument, at any rate as far as it applied to the employment of novelties. We cannot help thinking that the combative qualities which form the basis of a soldier's profession carried Colonel Hale rather further in his remarks than he intended. For hitherto he has shown himself not only open to conviction as to the utility of military novelties, but has given much time and labour in order to assist in solving some of the tactical problems which are involved in the employment of cyclist infantry.

We were glad to notice that Colonel Savile took the same general view about the cycling experiments at Easter that we put forward at the time, and that he was supported in the line he took by Colonel Cooper King, who acted as umpire in chief on that occasion. It is as well to draw attention to this fact, because there was then, in some of the least well-informed papers at any rate, a great deal of inaccurate statement as well as ignorant judgment. And in the vague talk which followed, the efforts of the cyclists were regarded as having met only with failure. We are now definitely told that no other military force could have done what was actually done on this first occasion of trial.

One of the most interesting points that has been raised is the question of whether the preference is to be given to what are called multicycles or to machines carrying only one rider. In the detachment of regular cyclists at Aldershot they have a preference for machines which carry four men, but which can be coupled together to hold six, eight, ten, or twelve. The advantages of this system are, first, that the force is more compact, and that the "tailing out" of a long column is to some extent avoided; and, secondly, that the machines can be wheeled along the road by one man, while the remainder are attacking in an extended formation. The disadvantages are, first, that if any of the four men are lazy, the work thrown on to the others is excessive; secondly, that multicycles are very much more difficult to move along very bad roads than single safety bicycles. In addition to this, it will be always necessary to have a certain number of single machines, as scouting and message carrying cannot be always done in parties of four or more. There is also a further difficulty in the way of the use of multicycles by Volunteers—namely, that, as each man owns the machine he rides, and uses it for his ordinary touring work, there is no means of purchasing machines to hold more than one, unless the corps funds could be made available. The whole subject, however, is still too much in its infancy for us to be able to pronounce with certainty on many unsettled points. It is to be hoped that the Report of the Committee, which we are now informed [illegible], will be published soon; and we also [illegible] of [illegible] in [illegible] in which the [illegible]. OUR FOREIGN TRADE.

THE Board of Trade returns for May are exceedingly satisfactory. In the latter part of the autumn there were general hopes that the present would be one of the most prosperous years we had witnessed for a long time; but the early spring brought disappointment, and it is with special satisfaction, therefore, we see so decided a recovery in May. The value of the imports for that month was 30,370,775*l.*, being an increase compared with May of last year of 2,449,454*l.*, or about 8¾ per cent.; and the value of the exports of British and Irish produce and manufactures was 19,276,225*l.*, an increase compared with May last year of 2,778,889*l.*, or about 16¾ per cent. For the first five months of the year the increase in the case of the imports was only 5¼ per cent., and in the case of the exports was somewhat under 7¾ per cent. It will be seen, therefore, that the proportionate increase in May, both in imports and exports, was very much greater than for the five months including May. In other words, May is by far the best month of the year so far as it has gone. It is to be recollected, however, that there was one more working day in May this year than in May last year; but, even making allowance for that, the improvement is very remarkable. The Times, in a leading article on Monday, thought it necessary to assure its readers that an excess in the value of the imports over the exports was not a matter of regret, and characteristically assigned an entirely wrong reason for the phenomenon. We should have thought that by this time even the Times might have learned that the value of the imports exceeds that of the exports partly because in the value of the imports is included freight and commission, while these are not included in the value of the exports; and, further, that the imports include the return on investments of British capital abroad, and the payment for British shipping also employed abroad. Since the Times seems to be ignorant on these points, we need offer no apology for referring to them. There is, however, another circumstance connected with the imports as to which the Times might with better reason have expressed some disappointment. Of the total increase of 2,449,454*l.* in the value of the imports for the month of May, no less than 1,327,479*l.* is in articles of food and drink duty free. In other words, more than half the total increase in the value of the imports is in articles which might have been produced at home. Our readers are aware that during the past twenty years the total additional supply of food required by the increase in the population and by the rise in the standard of living has been drawn from foreign countries; that is to say, our own farmers have not increased their supply to the home population. And it would appear at first sight from the figures we have just cited that they are rather losing than gaining ground. But it is to be recollected that, owing to the drought of last year, the barley and oat crops were very deficient, so were peas and beans, fruits, and the like. Now, of the total increase in the value of articles of food and drink duty free imported in May, nearly half a million is due to the increase in barley, and 113,000*l.* in oats. There is also a large increase in beans and a small increase in peas. It is true, nevertheless, that there is a considerable increase likewise in the value of dead meats of all kinds imported, in cheese, butter, and fruit; but in wheat there is a smaller import, and since the 1st of September—that is, since the beginning of the current agricultural year—there is a falling off in the imports of wheat compared with the corresponding period of the last agricultural year. This is partly due, no doubt, to the fact that the warmth and drought of last year were favourable to the wheat crop, and that the yield of that crop has proved to be really larger than at the time it was estimated to be. Secondly, it is doubtless due to the short crops of the United States and India. The Russian crop was immense, and the exports from Russia have consequently been so large that the price has not risen as might have been expected. But yet the price during the current agricultural year was higher than last year, and this doubtless has tended to keep down consumption. There is one other feature of the imports which is not satisfactory—it is the decrease in chemicals, dye-stuffs, and tanning substances, and also in the raw materials of manufacture. It would seem when trade is growing, as the figures before us prove it to be, that we might have expected increased imports of raw materials; but possibly the falling off last month was due to exceptional causes.

Turning now to the exports, we find, both for the month and for the five months, an increase under every heading. The increase is largest, however, in yarns and textile fabrics. Of the total increase, for example, of 2,778,389*l.*, no less than 1,251,286*l.* is under the head of yarns and textile fabrics, or very nearly half; and this increase is mainly due to the increased exports to the East of both cotton yarn and cotton piece-goods. There is a decided increase to China and Japan, as well as to India. But what is most remarkable is the increase in the exports of cotton yarn and twist to China and Japan. Our Lancashire manufacturers have for some time past been concerned at the rapidity of the growth of cotton manufactures in the Bombay Presidency. It has often been pointed out that the mills, being so close to where cotton is grown, have a great advantage over their Lancashire competitors; and these latter, in consequence, have become alarmed at the rapidity with which the manufacture was growing in India, and the vigour with which the Bombay millowners were pushing their business in China and Japan. There is nothing remarkable, therefore, in the fact that the export of cotton yarn to India goes on. In other words, the manufacturers of Bombay buy yarn here at home to turn it into cloth, which they sell both in India and in China and Japan. Apparently the spinning-mills in India are not able to supply the demand of the weaving-mills. But the remarkable circumstance to which we would now call attention is the increase in the exports of cotton yarn and twist both to China and Japan. Thus, for the first five months of last year only 3,046,100 lbs. of cotton yarn and twist were exported to China and Hongkong, whereas in the first five months of this year the exports have amounted to as much as 7,917,000 lbs., or considerably more than twice as much. In the first five months of last year the exports to Japan were 5,736,600 lbs., and in the corresponding period of this year they have risen to as much as 14,223,600 lbs. Apparently, then, the cotton manufacture in both China and Japan is rapidly growing. There has likewise been an increase in the exports of cotton manufactures to the South American States, except the Argentine Republic. The increase in the exports both of cotton yarn and of cotton piece-goods to India is the more remarkable because of the falling off in the exports of wheat from India. Thus in the first five months of the current year we imported from India only 913,835 cwts. of wheat, against 2,950,250 cwts. in the corresponding period of last year. Our purchases of wheat from India, therefore, in the five months of this year were less than a third of our purchases in the corresponding period of last year; but, on the other hand, we sold to India a larger quantity of cotton yarn and cotton piece-goods. The increase is not so remarkable for the five months; but in the month of May the increase is really remarkable. In May of last year the exports of cotton piece-goods to Bombay were 37,577,000 yards; but this year in the same month they were 55,328,000 yards; those to Madras rose from 10,137,300 yards to 13,921,400 yards, and those to Bengal and Burmah from 79,618,500 yards to 103,573,500 yards. There can be but one explanation of this fact. The long immunity of India from famine, the opening up of the country by means of railways, the construction of public works, and the general growth of wealth and industry have so greatly increased the purchasing power of the people that, notwithstanding a comparatively bad harvest twelve months ago, and a consequent great falling off in the sales of wheat to this country, the Indian people are able to buy the cotton cloth they require much more largely from us.

It would, of course, be rash to infer that we are about to see a great development in our trade because May has been so satisfactory. The increase in that month may have been due to temporary causes, and may, therefore, not be maintained; but the probability is that the improvement in trade will be maintained. It has now gone on slowly since the end of 1885. Very curiously it has manifested itself most strongly at the close of each year. At the end of 1885 very high hopes were engendered, which, however, the following year disappointed. Towards the close of 1886, however, still stronger hopes were entertained, and, as every reader will recollect, in October and November of last year the expectations of the trading community were most sanguine; in the first four months of the current year there was a decided check given to trade, and now once more hope is beginning to prevail. There are signs of improvement even in the iron trade, which a little while ago looked almost desperate, and the quantity of business being done in every other industry is unquestionably very large. The market reports and trade circulars are likewise more hopeful than they were, and all the statistical evidence, such as the railway traffic returns and the Clearing House returns, undoubtedly go to confirm the evidence of the Board of Trade returns. Add to all this that the value of money is at present exceedingly low. Wages have been reduced, economies have been introduced into every department of business, the cost of living is much less than it was a few years ago, and the purchasing power of the people has consequently increased. All this goes to strengthen the belief that the improvement in trade will not only continue, but that it will gain in volume and momentum. As yet, however, there is very little tendency to speculate. In trade as well as upon the Stock Exchange when a marked revival is expected the more enterprising and far-seeing are apt to buy up stocks for the purpose of selling again when prices rise, and the fact that there is so little speculation now goes rather against what we have been saying above, since it tends to show that the best-informed do not anticipate any considerable rise in prices. It is to be recollected, on the other hand, however, that there has been a very great rise in some prices, notably in copper; and, further, it is to be recollected that trade improvement may go on without any very marked rise in prices for some time yet. Lastly, it is not to be left out of sight that speculators have to take into account political probabilities as well as economic calculations. If war were to break out, for example, the trade improvement might not be checked, but undoubtedly the current of trade would be diverted, and, further, so much disturbance would be caused in the money markets all over the world that the speculators might suffer very heavy losses. Until, therefore, the course of events upon the Continent for the present year can be forecast a little more clearly, it is not surprising that speculators avoid committing themselves largely in new enterprises. It is doubtless the very uncertainty of politics upon the Continent that causes trade to improve so much more rapidly towards the close of each year and to fall off again as the spring advances. Speculators feel at the beginning of the autumn that they have a few months before them during which they can count with reasonable certainty upon peace being maintained, whereas when the spring is approaching they fear what may happen from day to day. That nevertheless trade has improved in so marked a manner last month is decisive evidence of the strength of the causes which are working towards improvement at present, and go to prove, as we have said, that unless war actually breaks out that improvement is likely to continue, and even if war were to break out, it by no means follows that improvement would be stopped.

THE BRITISH MUSEUM—MR. BOND'S RESIGNATION.

THE retirement from active life of a public servant of high character and distinguished ability must always be regarded with regret, and it is thus that our readers will have received the recent announcement of the resignation of Mr. Edward A. Bond, the Principal Librarian of the British Museum. It is now fifty years since, at the age of twenty-two, Mr. Bond became a member of the staff, having already had a five years' training in the Public Record Office, then located in the Tower of London. In 1870, after proving his fitness in less important posts, he became Keeper of the Manuscript Department, and in the fortieth year of his service, on the resignation of the late Mr. Winter Jones, was promoted to the office which for nearly ten years he has so worthily occupied. At the time of his appointment there were those who thought that a forty years' continuous employment was rather a disqualification, and the opinion was openly expressed that a younger and presumably a more energetic man should have been entrusted with the supervision of a national establishment, the management of which was in many respects regarded as somewhat behind the age. It was soon found, however, that the result more than justified the recommendation of the Trustees, and the reforms and improvements which were originated and successfully carried out by the new Librarian have proved that he was possessed of equal energy and administrative ability; and those only who knew the Museum during the years which preceded his appointment can properly appreciate the reforms which have been effected during Mr. Bond's tenure of office, or recognize the thoughtful and beneficent administration which, supported as he has been throughout by a loyal and most efficient body of "Keepers" and assistants, has converted what promised to become nothing more than a splendid cabinet of curiosities into a valuable and most important educational institution.

It is to Mr. Bond that students owe the introduction of the electric light into the Reading-room. This improvement, so grateful during the dark winter days, was followed by a considerable extension of the hours when the Reading-room was available, and by the removal of certain vexatious regulations respecting the renewal of tickets of admission. Previous to this time the ticket, issued under strictest rules, and for a limited period, might at any time be demanded, and its production was necessary at the entrance of the Reading-room to obtain admission; and though the attendants when they knew their visitor did not always enforce the regulations too literally, they have been known in legitimate fulfilment of their duty to turn back an archbishop, one of the most distinguished scholars of his day, to say nothing of men of lesser note who had forgotten to renew their ticket or neglected to bring it with them; while from other departments, that the privileged ticket-holder might not be disturbed, the ordinary visitor was on Tuesdays and Thursdays rigidly excluded. Soon followed the removal of the Natural History Collection to its new home at South Kensington; this, though relieving the overcrowded galleries, and giving much needed, even if insufficient space, for the treasures accumulated at Bloomsbury, which had never yet been properly exhibited, entailed upon the Principal Librarian an unusual amount of forethought and careful calculation. The new "White" buildings, which owe their existence to the munificent bequest of the late Mr. William White, and are erected at the eastern side of the Museum, covering what until now had been the Principal Librarian's garden, have throughout had the benefit of Mr. Bond's judicious supervision. In them are the storehouse and gallery for the prints and drawings, workrooms long and urgently required for the Manuscript Department, newspaper rooms, and, above all, the beautiful galleries in which are exhibited the Japanese drawings and the superb collection of glass, china, and majolica; and in another part of the Museum a gallery has been built in connexion with the department of Greek and Roman antiquities for the reception of the extraordinarily interesting remains removed hither from the Mausoleum of Halicarnassos. One work only has Mr. Bond left unfinished; in years gone by the officials of the Museum were apparently bent upon proving to a not too exacting public that to print a catalogue of the books in the library was a thing impossible. The utmost that could be done was to print a catalogue of the "books of reference" in the Reading-room; but to produce anything like an exhaustive catalogue of the whole library was regarded as too impracticable to be attempted. It did not seem to have occurred to them that the value of a catalogue of a great national library lies, not only in showing what books it possesses, but in disclosing what books are wanting, and that the publication of such a catalogue and its judicious distribution would do more towards supplying deficiencies than would years of tedious examination of a huge catalogue in manuscript. If Mr. Bond had no other claim upon our gratitude than the initiation of this useful work, already considerably advanced, we should have [illegible] sufficient cause to express our obligation; and we are inclined to anticipate that this most useful work will in the end prove one of the most advantageous of those reforms which Mr. Bond has introduced during his ten years of successful administration.

Among the many gracious acts which fill the life of the Prince of Wales, the kindly consideration which, as we are told, has led him to express, personally, his regrets to Mr. Bond upon his resignation, will, we are sure, be appreciated by hundreds of students, frequenters of the Museum, who, perhaps not even knowing Mr. Bond by sight, will gladly acknowledge the advantages which have attended his management; and, just as a well-ordered household is very much what its chief makes it, so we must attribute some part of the unvarying courtesy shown by the numerous officials and attendants to the system under which they are united. With regard to his successor we own to some natural curiosity; we entirely disagree, and that in the best interests of the Museum, with the strongly expressed opinion of a contemporary that he should be sought outside of the present staff. The system introduced by Mr. Bond, well designed and efficiently carried out, is capable of still further extension; and it is to be hoped that the names presented to Her Gracious Majesty for her selection will be of those who have already proved their competence in their own special department and who are conversant with and prepared to carry forward the reforms and improvements which Mr. Bond has approved, if he has not already adopted.

THE EDGWARE ROAD FIRE AGAIN.

THE accounts of the inquest give another opportunity of calling public attention to the results of crowding a large number of persons into the upper levels of a high building, and locking them up there, without a possibility of escape for all in the event of a fire occurring. For anything we know the Edgware Road building may have been more favourably situated and managed than many others which might be named, and certainly we have no desire to convey any insinuation or reflection on the owners of that unfortunate place; but this only accentuates the force of our remarks when we say, without hesitation or reserve, that the locking up of persons in a building stored with inflammable goods is a most dangerous proceeding, and should not be permitted without corresponding safeguards.

Let us suppose that 100 persons are lodged in the upper levels of a shop or warehouse, and consider the circumstances necessarily and inseparably connected with such a proceeding. There must be 100 beds, 100 places at a table on which at least 300 meals must be provided every day, a kitchen capable of supplying 300 meals a day, a place in which 100 pairs of boots can be dried and brushed, and a certain amount of other accommodation. Do the responsible owners of these places presume to say that there really is proper accommodation for such a number of persons, and do they prove that such is their view by including themselves among the number? These are interesting questions, and we know that there are some who can answer them satisfactorily; but how about the others? We have made inquiries, and have reason to believe that there are many buildings in London, and elsewhere, in which numbers of human beings are every night locked up—perhaps properly so, but without any possibility of all escaping in case of a rush, simply because the accommodation is too limited, and the responsible persons are not among those placed under lock and key. Indeed it is said, though we do not go so far as to corroborate this, that in many cases the whole accommodation is barely sufficient for the boots alone, and that in the event of a rush for life only a fourth of the occupants would be likely to escape.

We are all in the habit of running down the institutions of our country, and for anything we know the strength of those institutions—such as it is—may be owing to the fact that this is the case; but at least we must give credit to a jury which does its duty thoroughly and fearlessly, and we need not look too closely into details. It may be that unnecessary speeches were made by counsel, jurymen, witnesses, and even the Coroner himself; that the inquiry was somewhat more prolonged and less dignified than one before a Lord Chief Justice of England. These are the necessary and unavoidable accompaniments of any trial before an "open" Court, as a Coroner's Court is; but, making allowance for all these deplorable blemishes, we do not hesitate to say that in this case the verdict expresses in a practical manner all the important circumstances of the case. It is virtually as follows:—(1) The persons who died lost their lives through misadventure. (2) The fire originated in a basement where wood and waste material were kept, and was occasioned by a lighted match being thrown down on the floor by a servant-girl after she had lighted the gas in the room. This was an act of great carelessness. (3) Two firemen who had left their fire-escape for the day, but, in the opinion of their own officer, were properly called, refused to return and take their escape to the fire. (These men were severely censured, and, we may add, it is now publicly known that they have been dismissed from the Brigade.) (4) The premises were not properly protected against the [illegible] of fire, and proper exits were not provided in the event of such a calamity happening. The majority of the buildings in the metropolis being in the same condition, the [illegible] of the local authorities and the public [illegible] to the [illegible] which exists for providing and enforcing such [illegible] regulations as shall secure to the inmates of such establishments ready means of escape in the case of fire. (5) Ample appliances should be provided for extinguishing fire. (6) All such establishments should be inspected periodically. (7) In the interest of the public safety inquiry should be held in all cases of fire. (8) The Metropolitan Board of Works should arrange for a definite settlement of certain clauses of the Building Act, the interpretation of which appears doubtful. (9) The same Board should make arrangements for firemen to be in charge of fire-escapes by day as well as by night. (10) The conduct of those who rendered valuable aid in rescuing inmates is commended. (11) Albo-carbon, when stored in large quantities, should be kept in iron vessels specially constructed and apart from combustible materials.

This verdict is purely and distinctly of the type which we are in the habit of calling "British," and we claim to be among the first to acknowledge and approve it accordingly; but this acknowledgment, which we make very frankly and not without a certain national pride, must not be allowed to deprive us of our equally national privilege of friendly criticism. With that part of the verdict which refers to the special regulations for means of escape in case of fire we cordially concur; but the jury does not propose or suggest the authority to which the power is to be entrusted. In the existing condition of the Metropolitan Board of Works it is not to be supposed that any further powers are likely to be conferred on that body, and we know of no other at present which can be substituted for it. The providing of ample appliances for extinguishing fire, and the periodical inspection of "such premises"—meaning premises in which large numbers of persons are locked up at night—are excellent suggestions; but the jury does not even remotely intimate what the authority should be under which these great powers should be placed, and we know that any interference in the internal management of large concerns would be resented by owners and others. The proposal of the jury, however, is a wise one, and we hope it will engage the attention of legislators.

The question of an inquiry being held in all cases of fire, whether life is lost or not, is one of public convenience, and is not without certain difficulties; but the City has just carried a Bill for this purpose through the Lords, and if its working proves satisfactory other places will probably adopt it. The proposals that the Board of Works should arrange for an interpretation of clauses of an Act of Parliament, and for the attendance of firemen by day in charge of fire-escapes—involving a large increase of expenditure, and a new Act of Parliament—however good in themselves, can have no effect at present in consequence of the inquiry that is now going on; but the suggestions in themselves are good, and will probably be carried out as soon as the affairs of the metropolis are placed on anything like a practical basis, if such a fortunate event ever takes place.

We desire to impress on all concerned the serious lesson which has been taught by the terrible disaster in Edgware Road, and to warn all those who lock up large numbers of persons at night without taking proper precautions for the safety of every individual that, in the event of such a catastrophe occurring again, they are by no means certain to find so liberal a jury as that which has returned the verdict on which these comments are made. Indeed, we venture to add that, if the same jury were to sit on another similar case, it would return a very different verdict, and in our judgment would be perfectly justified in doing so, as the fact of a warning having been formally and publicly given must necessarily involve a corresponding responsibility on all concerned. In conclusion, we desire to repeat the hope which we have previously expressed, that all those who keep others under lock and key will make the necessary arrangements for the safety of every individual in the event of a rush for life, and also that they will in every case include at least one of their own number among those who incur the greatest danger. That this is probable in many cases and certain in some few we willingly and cheerfully acknowledge; but we earnestly hope that the great catastrophe which has recently happened may serve as a warning, and that those who are responsible for the safety of others in large buildings may feel that henceforth, in the event of loss of life, they will have to deal, not with the Edgware Road jury, but with a jury which will feel compelled to enforce the lessons so clearly and practically taught by their intelligent predecessors. There is much to be said against Coroners and Coroners' juries; but we are bound to express our opinion that the men who sat at the Edgware Road inquest have given a straightforward, manly, and intelligent verdict, and that all employers who keep their assistants locked up at night will do well to take every precaution that is possible to ensure the safety of each individual under their charge.

If such employers will carefully and conscientiously study the recent verdict, it may be hoped that the terrible event which has just occurred may lead to an immediate and permanent improvement in the condition of large numbers of persons; but we regret to have to add our fear that, in the present limp and invertebrate condition of society, another similar catastrophe may probably occur before those concerned will be awakened to their actual responsibilities, and that, in order to bring about any real practical change, we shall be compelled to speak in language very much more forcible than that which we use at present. In the meanwhile we commend to the favourable judgment of our readers the straightforward and practical verdict of the Edgware Road jury.

ARCHITECTURE AT THE ROYAL ACADEMY.

THE show of architectural designs this year is remarkably uninteresting. We are already acquainted more or less intimately with the largest and most important drawings, such as those of Mr. Brooks for Liverpool Cathedral, Messrs. Deane & Son's and Messrs. Aston, Webb, & Bell's for the Imperial Institute, as well as with Mr. Collcutt's unfortunately accepted design. We have now three kinds of architecture to review. It was long said that no one could invent a style; if it is not a paradox, Mr. Waterhouse and his disciples have invented something that is no style. Mr. Collcutt is almost the only exhibitor in it this year, and we can turn away to some better things, if not to many of them; for the good things are scarce in the show, and have to be looked for and sought out diligently. If we begin with classical or Palladian designs, we may commend Messrs. Deane's fine drawing mentioned above. The curved and pillared wings supporting a noble dome, in front of which is a dignified portico, make up a fine design, and one which, minus the pepper-caster turrets, would have been worthy of the suffrages of the selectors. The Ionic screen in Mr. Boney's Academy design for a railway terminus is good; but the very similar drawing of Mr. Leck, which hangs close to it, fails entirely, owing to the want of proportion. Mr. J. J. Stevenson's "New Building, Christ's College, Cambridge," stands almost alone as an example of the style as understood by Inigo Jones. There is much to admire in it. The proportions, in which modern architects so often fail, have been carefully considered. The cornice is good, but we could wish that Mr. Stevenson had seen his way to repeat the pilasters along the front. It is not very easy to say in what style Mr. Burgess's Leicester Coffee House is designed, but it has pilasters and a tall, peaked roof and turrets of diverse character, and is altogether an original and effective composition, a little too foreign, perhaps, in parts. Also in what, for want of a better term, we may call debased Palladian, are Mr. Belcher's "Stables at Northleach," and "Stowell Park." The drawings of these quaint and picturesque buildings are remarkably effective, and are signed by Mr. Needham Wilson. Mr. Crowther's careful study of the "Oakroom, New River Company," is more of a picture than an architectural drawing, as is Mr. Cecil Roper's view of "The Castle, Halifax."

Of the so-called "Queen Anne" style perhaps the designs of Messrs. George & Peto are the most interesting, or at least conspicuous. We cannot approve of them for town houses. There are eight very picturesque drawings from this firm in the gallery. Of these, "A House on Streatham Common" is perhaps the most pleasing; but the country houses at Champion Hill, Henley, Bagshot, and Pinner are also pretty and suitable. We cannot admire "Buildings in Mount Street and Berkeley Square." They are absolutely without the dignity so necessary in town houses, and are covered with every kind of excrescence calculated to catch London soot. "Moxley, Holmbury," by Mr. Basil Champneys, is neat and pleasant looking; but the same architect's "Park Mansions" has all the faults we have attributed to Messrs. George & Peto's buildings in Berkeley Square. A good site is virtually spoilt by this fussy design; and we have another reason to be glad Mr. Plunket has insisted on its being lowered by two storeys. If Mr. Champneys would take the opportunity of removing altogether the gables and dormers of his upper storeys, and would finish the building with a good cornice, it might be redeemed from absolute ugliness. Mr. Reginald Blomfield sends a very charming drawing of the new buildings which he is erecting at Haileybury College. Another very pretty drawing is by Mr. Charles Mallows, "House on the Severn, near Upton." This and several other drawings by the same architect remind us somewhat of the style of Mr. Pennell's sketches, and would form admirable book illustrations. Mr. Bailey's extensive design for a Board School at Lavender Hill has considerable dignity; and Messrs. Mitchell & Butler have designed a picturesque school for Lewisham Hill.

We now come to the purely Gothic work in the gallery. Mr. Brooks's "Liverpool Cathedral" is the most important, and has already been described in these columns. Mr. Coates Carter sends his "Design for the proposed West Front of Milan Cathedral." The present west front is incongruous, as everybody knows; but a Gothic west front of this kind would be almost as incongruous, and not nearly so picturesque. Mr. Sedding's fine "Church of the Holy Trinity, Upper Chelsea," which is being built for Lord Cadogan, shows greater originality in the treatment of the old style than we often see. The west window is simply magnificent. We may describe the whole church as being of the Decorated type, but with later features in places. We cannot quite approve of the wooden imitation vaulting. It is difficult to understand how Mr. Arthur Blomfield can have designed both the very stiff and uninteresting additions to Eton College, and also the very pretty porch of St. Mary's, Southsea, a panelled Perpendicular building, with good ornament in the right place. Mr. Jackson has done better things than his new front to Brasenose. The situation is a trying one; and Mr. Jackson's design appears to us laboured, and what in painting would be called "spotty." It has too much or too little feature, but which we cannot say from the inspection of drawings only. The scale will have much influence on the success or failure of this design. The proposed "restoration" of Worksop Priory Church, by Messrs. Carpenter & Ingelow, is extremely uninteresting architecturally, and extremely reprehensible archæologically. Why not spend the money on a new building, instead of making a design in fetters, like this, and spoiling an interesting fragment? The gallery contains the usual number of drawings for decorative work, of which Mr. Heaton's "Acanthus, Oak, and Privet," and his friezes in "gesso duro," are all that need be named. Mr. Norman Shaw does not exhibit anything this year; and his fellow-Academician Mr. Waterhouse's two views of Roman buildings are in the water-colour room.

MINOR EXHIBITIONS.

MESSRS. BOUSSOD & VALADON are preparing an exhibition of the works of the brothers Maris; meantime they have several pictures of interest in their galleries. To begin with the best, there are two Corots. One of these is composed in a somewhat unusually informal manner. A large near-hand bouquet of trees, a cool, cloudy sky, a corner of a pool, and figures wrapt in air and shadow, form the elements of a picture which is remarkable for beauty of handling and mystery of tone rather than for stately or classic arrangement. The other—a fine Corot of the usual sort—shows the shore of a lake with cows wading in under the branches of large trees. Both these canvases contain models of the art of painting trees with grace and breadth, of suggesting an infinity of detail by planting a few telling forms on largely modelled masses. These dots and strokes are laid, not only with a Japanese sense of beauty, but with such consummate judgment and truth that the imagination instantly peoples the broad, cloudy smudges on which they rest with hints of similar detail. No elaborate, and after all necessarily inadequate, rendering of the small forms one by one would give this breadth of impression or secure this softness of definition and this true magic of atmospheric envelopment. Some of Corot's qualities, without his quintessence of style, may be seen in a small group of trees by De Bock; a tender twilight pastoral by Mauve; and a little piece of sober, harmonious colour by Mr. Peppercorn, which we have seen at the New English Art Club. Josef Israels sometimes falls into copying himself without gusto and as if sick of his own sentiment. Here, however, is a view of three peasant children going out to work that has evidently not been done as a task. The fine rich quality of the sky, the freshness and uncommonness of the whole scheme, and the cheerfulness of the figures, make it a very welcome change from the painter's usual manner. Figures in a cottage, seated in the firelight, must be a work of Edouard Frere's, done either very early or in some holiday interval, when he had put aside all thought of the requirements of the British picture-market. We cannot take leave of this gallery without mentioning Mr. Aubrey Hunt's "Greenwich Pier." In large canvases Mr. Hunt has not often pleased us so well as in his charming and vivacious sketches. Here, however, is one of his biggest efforts in size, and, we are glad to say, in force and seriousness of purpose. Mr. Hunt has at last managed to keep the fine flavour of his style on a large scale. He is piquant, fresh, and suggestive, as he was in his little pictures exhibited here some time ago. The time is evening, when the lights on the river are struggling with the dying light in the sky, and Mr. Hunt has given the large values of the scene in a way that brings the whole thing before one with a convincing impression of truth. There is a great art in his handling, in his varied definition of objects, in his treatment of local colour under twilight. The suggestion of the smoke-wrapt shipping in the middle distance is specially exquisite; but so, indeed, is the rendering of the crowd on the sloppy pier, the liquid lapping water, the wind-blown clouds of smoke, the differently coloured lamps, and the half-veiled masses of huge building.

A collection of old masters—that is to say, of nothing more modern than Constable or Bonington—at Mr. Borgen's, Old Bond Street, offers many problems to the expert, and a quiet lounging place to the general public, where there is no garish new paint to offend the eye. We do not pretend to expertmanship in old pictures; we are not convinced that an old master never varied as a modern does, never made experiments in styles like Mr. Richmond, or never painted badly what an obscure pupil painted well. Nevertheless, we are not to be persuaded that Raphael painted the Madonna di San Sisto which hangs at the end of this gallery. One does not model a face as in the Dresden picture, and then straightway vulgarize it as in this woman's head. Examine the photograph of the Dresden canvas and note the large light and shade on the cheek, the soft envelopment of the eyes and mouth in shadow, the ample fulness of the nose and brow, and then look at the rude modelling, hard huge eyes, and coarsely defined mouth, of the copy on the wall. Moreover, it will be remarked that changes of strength in the definition or forms of folds are all for the worse, and tend to cut up the masses and destroy the solemn repose of the picture. Need we point to the heavy, somewhat clumsy Flemish character of the touch; the modelling and the feeling of line alone suffice to stamp the picture as no work of Raphael's hand. On the other hand, "Canal Scene, Venice," is an admirable example of its author's style. Guardi seldom got a finer quality of sky and distance than he did in this picture. "[illegible]" is a specially good and realistic Copley Fielding; "[illegible]" a very fair Van der [illegible]; "Landscape, [illegible]" an instance of Cuyp's fine sky-painting; and "Portrait of [illegible] Lady Hamilton," an interesting Romney, warm and mellow [illegible]. "King Ahasuerus and Esther" (Rubens), "Landscape [illegible]" (Adam Elsheimer), "Adam and Eve" (Andrea [illegible] attributed to), "The Adoration of St. Andreas" (Tiepolo), and examples of Van Ostade, Jan Steen, N. Vroomans, Hobbema, and R. Wilson, deserve attention, even if they may not all come from their presumed authors.

When you may see all the stones in a building, all the names cut in a desk, &c., you know that you need not expect good art. It is not given to many to equal Van Eyck, and the illustration of Eton, Rugby, Harrow, and the public schools generally is not a subject likely to occupy a modern man so gifted. All, however, for whom those illustrations now on view at Messrs. Dickinson & Foster's are made—that is, public school boys—will probably be satisfied. Mr. Barraud has done the chapels and buildings with such patience and care that those who wish to pry into pictures will find all they know in the places. Those who do not know or care for the places will do well to avoid the depressing influence of one of the tightest and meanest styles to be seen, even in London. Mr. Tom Hemy deals with football, cricket, &c., and gets some "go" and action into his figures, though he does not seriously attempt picture-making or artistic composition. Mr. Rhead, who etches after him, freezes the life out of his figures, hardens his definitions, and supplies him with a force of detail which he evidently does not want.

STAGE SCIENCE.

VII.

LYRIC acting differs essentially from the merely dramatic, and requires quite another kind of study to master its many difficulties, for it is closely allied to the serious division of the ancient art of dancing—that which Aristotle described as "the expression of manners, passions, and deeds in rhythmical gesture." The opera itself, being a modification, though at more than one remove, of the Greek drama, still contains many traditions in its performance evidently derived from remote antiquity. The stereotyped grouping of the chorus and the arrangement of the principal personages in a row close down by the footlights, somewhat after the fashion of the actors in one of Molière's plays as performed at the Comédie Française, are all derived from the classical period of the drama. It is impossible to define when opera was really first invented. Rinuccini, in 1600, produced the first opera according to modern rules, Dafne, with music of Jacopo Peri, who may claim to be the inventor of operatic recitative. There is a rare engraving still extant of Henry III. of France assisting at a performance of a musical drama by Claudio Merulo in the hall of a Venetian palace where he was entertained on his visit to Venice when returning from Poland to claim his brother's crown. In it we see the four principal actors standing in a row, exactly as they would in any opera now in course of representation at Covent Garden, and apparently using the same violent gesticulation. To be a great lyric actor or actress the artist must study that peculiar art known in Italy as mimica, best interpreted in English as pantomime or "dumb show." Mme. Pasta, who was even more distinguished as a lyric actress than as a vocalist, used to rehearse her parts entirely in pantomime, and was only satisfied when her friends could tell her the exact meaning of what she was representing, without being previously told the story of the opera. The plastic arts have to be much more carefully studied by the operatic singer than by the mere histrion, because the vocalist stands so much more in evidence; has to walk, as a rule, over and to fill a much larger stage. The stride has to be longer and the step much firmer and more methodical; the gestures broader and more sustained, and even the facial expression may be stronger and coarser. Therefore the first art which the lyric student has to master is the walk or stride, so as to enable him to get over space gracefully and without appearing awkward. The brothers De Reszké have acquired the operatic stage walk to perfection. They invariably move their feet and legs to the rhythm of the music. Like M. Faure, who is apparently their model, they are unusually economical of gesture, only making such movements of the hands and arms as are absolutely necessary and appropriate. These are almost invariably well chosen, graceful, and sustained until the close of the musical phrase which they illustrate. The lyric actor has a difficult task to perform. He has to "hold the picture," to use the technical expression, much longer than the ordinary theatrical artist. He is constantly posing, and frequently in a strained and even unnatural attitude, and has much difficulty in keeping within the narrow boundary which separates the sublime from the ridiculous. Of all the singers of recent times, the most perfect master of lyric acting is M. Faure, and its mistress, the late Mlle. Titiens, who wore the mantle of Pasta and Grisi with so such dignity, and who unfortunately has remained without a successor. The contrast between the Mephistopheles of M. Faure or M. De Reszké and the impersonation of the part of the same fiend by Mr. Irving admirably illustrates the difference which exists between lyric and simple dramatic acting. On the operatic stage all the broad effects must be retained and even exaggerated, whereas the more subtle touches must of necessity be omitted. The actor who gives the broad outline upon the operatic stage with the most [illegible] is of course the greatest lyric actor, [illegible] that the two De Reszké brothers [illegible] above their [illegible], dwarfing even M. [illegible] we can say [illegible] rank. Signor [illegible] actor of great refinement and [illegible]. His method is perhaps more highly finished than that of any of his contemporaries of equal position, and few who have ever seen him play Rigoletto will forget the magnificence of his acting in the third and fourth acts.

The more passionate a lyric actor, especially a tenor, is, the better. He has full scope for the display of amorous emotion, and what would shock upon the ordinary stage appears quite in its place on the operatic. The ardour of Manrico and Leonora, of Raoul and Valentine, would seem ridiculous if the music did not sustain their violent gesticulations, impassioned embracings, and the otherwise absurd manner in which they behave towards each other, tearing passion to tatters.

Wagner, who gets the credit of much more than he deserves, has undoubtedly revolutionized the lyric stage. In his attempt to increase the dramatic interests of the opera he has followed in the steps of Cherubini, Spontini, and Meyerbeer, who, by the way, managed far more skilfully to serve, with equal ability, the interests both of drama and music. Still the Wagnerian influence on lyric acting has been greater than that of any of his predecessors. He has most effectively broken down many absurd traditional habits, and emancipated singers from much that was conventional and absurd. The result, however, at present is not satisfactory. He has driven the lyric stage into a state of transition, which may result in the gradual adoption of too many new ideas, whereby much that is excellent in the old school will be neglected, and eventually lost. In the meantime the grouping of the choristers has been greatly improved under Mr. Augustus Harris's management, and this was apparent even in the venerable Lucia, where but recently the women stood on one side of a half-circle and beat their breasts, and the men on the other, alternately lifting and dropping their hands, whilst the Bride of Lammermoor, in her delirium, gave proof that at least Lady Ashton had not neglected her musical education. The lyric drama has certainly made gigantic strides in the present half of this century, and possibly its capabilities are not at all exhausted, and the lyric actor of the future may become a much more intelligent, graceful, and subtle performer than he is now. And yet when we remember Malibran and Rubini, Mario and Grisi, Lablache and Ronconi, Faure and Titiens, we have our misgivings that the golden future promised by Wagner and the distinguished critic above alluded to will not eclipse the glorious past.

THE CODICE PENALE AND BECCARIA.

As we predicted, the Italian Parliament voted for the entire Codice Penale early this week with little opposition. The laws against the so-called "abuses of the clergy" were indeed the subject of some lively discussion in which Deputies Odescalchi and Peruzzi vainly defended the rights of the priests. This facile victory was doubtless due to the fact that the Catholics still persist in abstaining from political life in Italy, so that there is great truth in the oft-repeated assertion that the most Radical Englishman would be considered an ultra-Conservative at Monte Citorio, where deputies of the Bradlaugh class are, to use the Italian expression, "as common as peas." It is a great mistake to imagine that the Italian Parliament represents the Italian nation. Far from it. No country, not even France, is so completely in the hands of a party; for, out of a population of 28,000,000, only about 250,000 vote. In a short time we shall be able to watch the progress of the fierce war which Signor Crispi has so recently provoked with the Papacy. In the meantime, let us hasten to acknowledge that, if we do not approve of the severity of these particular laws against the clergy, we cordially congratulate the Italians on possessing at last a uniform penal code for the entire country. Some of the new laws seem to us to savour rather of theoretical experiment than of practical statesmanship. The Liberal press, for instance, is in a state of hysterical enthusiasm over the passing of the law abolishing capital punishment. "Viva Beccaria!" cries the Epoca of Genoa, "the executioner is banished from Italy. Italy has taught a great lesson to-day to England and to America. She has abolished the public executioner. She is the torch-bearer of liberty and progress. Viva Beccaria!" It happens, however, that in Italy just now murder may be fairly described as stalking the streets; for scarcely a day passes without some three or four assassinations occurring, especially in the Southern provinces, where the pugnale is used with sinister readiness. The knife is freely abused too in Rome itself, and quite recently no less than four persons were assassinated in the streets of Genoa in less than a week. Notwithstanding these unpleasant facts, Signor Zanardelli grew quite enthusiastic as he read out the clause concerning what he is pleased to call forze irresistibili, whereby is meant that in many—nay, in most—cases murderers commit their "foul and bloody deeds" under circumstances beyond their control, and therefore should not be considered accountable for their actions. At Salerno last month, for instance, a woman who had deliberately cut her rival's throat was acquitted by the jury as being the victim of forza irresistibile, and we fear that before long whole batches of brigands will be similarly dealt with by accommodating juries as victims of their irresistible impulses. Sixtus V., who knew his countrymen well, tried the experiment some centuries ago of an increase of severity with remarkable success, as is well known to those who are familiar with the history of this sagacious, but by no means tender-hearted, Pontiff. He had at least the satisfaction of living to see Rome and the Romans freed of bands of brigands and assassins. Beccaria possibly desired the abolition of capital punishment, because he wrote at a period when men were hanged for sheep-stealing and for trifling misdemeanours of a like character. Even his greatest admirers—including Cesare Cantù—acknowledge that he was somewhat deficient in common sense and apt to allow his feelings to carry him away. Possibly if he were alive now, and could contemplate the results of his writings, and see how much milder justice has become, he would be the last to vote for the abolition of the supreme sentence.

M. PAUL FECHTER.

The death of M. Paul Fechter, son of the late M. Charles Fechter, had it occurred twenty years ago, would have created a much greater sensation than it has; for then his father was still one of the most deservedly popular actors who has ever appeared in England. M. Paul Fechter was fencing with a friend in Paris one day early last week when the broken foil of his adversary accidentally struck him near the left corner of the right eye and, piercing to the brain, killed him almost instantly. We trust that this fatal accident will not give rise to one of those periodical cries of alarm in which people are too wont to indulge when any exceptional accident occurs in the pursuit of certain manly sports or pastimes. The Italians have a saying to the effect that "there are exactly five genuine accidents on an average every year," and we may therefore take heart and place this sad one among the number of cinque vere disgrazie. But when we consider the countless fencing matches which take place every day, the number of fatalities connected with this particular sport are certainly not greater than those which attend cricket, or football, or polo—nay, indeed, lawn-tennis, for the matter of that. Fencing is one of the most graceful exercises—indeed, it is essentially the grace-giving exercise par excellence, and one which can be indulged in by men who have passed the meridian of life without loss of dignity or over-fatigue; and it would be folly to allow the fear of casualties such as this which befell M. Paul Fechter to interfere with its progress, only too slow as it is, towards popularity in this country. The death of M. Paul Fechter is all the more sad since he is known to have been a gentleman of charming character, and that his untimely death has left a family which idolized him to mourn his loss, in comparatively indigent circumstances, its chief support having been thus suddenly and cruelly torn from it.

REVIEWS.

Just twenty-one years ago Sir Thomas Wade published his Tzŭ erh chi, which has since held the field as the best book on the colloquial language of Peking. So highly was the work esteemed by students of Chinese that within a comparatively few years the whole edition became exhausted, and for a long time the work has been as difficult to obtain as a first edition of Cocker's "Arithmetick." A decade ago the demand for a new edition was very generally heard, and as time went on it was also recognized that there were imperfections in the arrangement and matter of the original work which might with advantage be amended. In response to these widely expressed feelings Sir Thomas Wade undertook to recast the book. But it was no easy matter to execute such a labour, at the same time that his official duties at Peking, complicated as they were by treaty revisions, international misunderstandings, and opium controversies, claimed his attention, and it would have been quite impossible but for the help of Mr. Hillier, whose careful hand and wide knowledge appear in every page of the work. Even when this portion of the task had been completed, there still remained the further difficulty of printing the volumes. Printing Chinese texts is always a slow and difficult matter. Four printing presses were employed in printing the original work. And though increased skill and improved machinery made it possible to print the new edition at one establishment, yet the time necessarily occupied dragged its slow length along through many months and even years. We take this opportunity of congratulating the managers of the Imperial Customs printing press on the admirable way in which they have accomplished their task, as well as on the wise liberality which induced them to make a present to the student world of their share in the undertaking.

The Tzŭ erh chi was designed, as we were told in the original preface, for Consular students. The treaty of 1858 had thrown open to foreigners the capital, a number of new treaty ports, and, for travelling purposes, the whole Empire. To members, therefore, of the Consular service the whole position of affairs had changed. To a race of young men who had studied the Mandarin dialect in the English colony at Hong Kong from the lips of Northern Chinamen who were almost as completely strangers to the native inhabitants as their pupils were, had succeeded batch after batch of competition wallahs, who were at once launched into Peking life, and who were there surrounded by a population to whom the Court dialect was their mother-tongue. At the treaty ports also the Taotais and Prefects, whose delight it had been to hold at arm's length the Consuls and their interpreters, learned, under the influence of the treaty, to unbend to the "foreign devils," and, following the example set by the officials of the Tsungli Yamên, to discuss politics with them over birds'-nest soup and bêches de mer.

Clearly, therefore, a new era had dawned on the student interpreter, and with his extended facilities for study came a desire for fuller and more trustworthy books on the language than had been at his command. Of all the mature scholars of the day Sir Thomas Wade was the one best qualified to supply the want, and in 1867 he published the original work of which the present is a much-revised version.

The object of the work being in the first instance to instruct the learner in the spoken language, the author had to decide whether he should write a grammar of the language, and append to it dialogues, or whether he should plunge in medias res, and, beginning with easy sentences, go on to sustained conversations. Rightly or wrongly, Sir Thomas Wade chose the second course. To many minds the idea of beginning to learn to speak a language before an insight has been gained into its nature and structure seems much like being thrown into deep water before one can swim. But the answer to this is that his work was intended to be used with the help of a native teacher; and, as those eminently learned and bespectacled gentry are as ignorant of all principles of grammar as they are of the laws of gravitation, a grammar, in our sense of the word, would be about as useful to them as a torpedo would be to a Hottentot. It was considered best, therefore, that the student should construct his own grammar as he advanced in the knowledge of speech. A conversation on the parts of speech towards the end of the colloquial series was inserted to put right any misconceptions he may have formed by the way, and to enlighten him in case he had failed to grasp the mechanism of the language.

Having arrived at a decision on this point, Sir Thomas Wade had next to consider what pronunciation of the language he should adopt. Those who are acquainted only with alphabetical languages cannot form any idea of the difficulty of transcribing the written characters of such a language as Chinese, especially when, as in Chinese, the subject is complicated by the existence of numberless and widely differing dialects. Not only every one of the eighteen provinces, but almost every district within those provinces, has its peculiar dialect, which has become hardened into a recognized speech by the stay-at-home habits of the people. So widely different are these dialects that many have claimed for the principal ones among them the titles of separate languages, and it is certain that a Canton coolie would be as unintelligible to villagers in the neighbouring province of Fuh-kien as an Aberdonian would be to a Devonshire peasant. By the Chinese themselves the existence of these dialects is recognized as a political inconvenience, and among the educated classes, especially among officials, a dialect has by common consent been adopted as a lingua franca throughout the Empire for all above the grade of the common people. This dialect is known as the Kwan hwa, or, as we translate it, "the Mandarin dialect." But, unfortunately, so long are the distances which separate different portions of the Empire, and so difficult is the travelling over the infamous roads and ruined canals of the country, that dialects have even sprung up within this dialect, and very appreciable differences of pronunciation are observable between the Peking mandarin, the Nanking mandarin, and the Ssŭch'uen mandarin. Even, therefore, when Sir Thomas Wade had determined to adopt the Mandarin dialect, the further question still remained whether the Peking or the Nanking dialect should be chosen; for between the Ssŭch'uen mandarin and these two there could be no question. Bearing in mind the conditions under which the Consular students were to use his work—namely, in Peking, surrounded on all sides by men speaking the Peking mandarin; and also that it is becoming fashionable for the higher officials with whom the Consular officials have to communicate to affect the Court dialect—we think that Sir Thomas Wade did wisely when he elected to use the Pekingese. Apart from these considerations, Pekingese has not much to commend it. It is one of the poorest dialects in China, having only 420 vocables against some 700 or 800 in Cantonese and other dialects, and bears in itself the marks of a weakened speech. But fashion even in China is supreme, and there can be no doubt that Pekingese is the best dialect for the student interpreters to learn.

But of all the vexed questions which have aroused the controversial ire of writers on Chinese and perplexed their readers, that of orthography is unquestionably the chief. Whether a word which is sounded like the English word "fun" should be written "făn," "fen," "fên," or "fun," is a specimen of the variety of opinions on the most suitable values to be given to the Roman letters in transcribing Chinese. Dr. Wells Williams writes "făn," Dr. Edkins "fen," Sir Thomas Wade "fên," and Dr. Morrison "fun." When doctors disagree, who is to decide? and we will leave the point, therefore, only adding that Sir Thomas Wade's system is consistent throughout, and that when once his sound-table is mastered, the student should have no difficulty whatever in catching the right pronunciation.

In the present edition Sir Thomas Wade has confined himself entirely to the colloquial series, having omitted the volumes on the documentary style. He begins with forty exercises, which consist of short phrases and sentences illustrative of the uses of certain words which precede each exercise. In the original work he had taxed the memories of students with twenty-five new words to every exercise. Against such violent intellectual gymnastics the students, he tells us in his preface, protested, and in deference to their complaints he has in the new work lightened their labours, and has rearranged his texts so as to break up the exercises into short lengths. Following on the exercises come the "Ten Dialogues" and the "Hundred Lessons," and after these a story in the colloquial style, entitled the "Graduate's Wooing." Tone exercises and a chapter on the parts of speech complete the contents of the two thicker volumes. The third volume contains "a Glossary," the "Peking Syllabary," and "Writing Exercises." This table of contents is enough to show that, so far as the Pekingese colloquial is concerned, the work arms the student cap-a-pie. Further, the dialogues are all well chosen, and some few phrases, which in the original work bore traces of being forced renderings of English idioms, have either disappeared or have been rewritten in pure Pekingese.

The Tone exercises have proved to be extremely useful, and one enthusiastic American minister thought so highly of them that he had them copied in a shape suitable for his pocket, and beguiled the tedium of a long journey in the interior by constantly conning them aloud. To the uninitiated it is necessary to explain that Chinese, in common with several other languages in South-Eastern Asia, is a tonic language; that is to say, that every one of its written characters has its proper vocalic pitch. In Pekingese there are four of these tones, in the central Mandarin there are five, and in some of the dialects there are as many as fifteen. A knowledge of these tones is necessary to a speaker when the context does not of itself make his meaning sufficiently plain. In these circumstances a traveller who wished to ask for ice, for instance, and pronounced the word ping in a rising or questioning tone, instead of in an even tone, would have a steamed dumpling brought him; and if, wishing to speak of an aching tooth, he were to pronounce ya in a falling tone, he would be understood to refer to his brother-in-law.

There can be no question, then, as to the importance of acquiring some knowledge of the tones, and this can be done in two ways, either by learning them by heart from such exercises as those in the present work, or by catching the rhythm of sentences from the mouths of natives. The appropriateness of each method must depend on the capabilities of each student. A man with a quick ear and an acquisitive tongue will pick up the tones without any more effort than it cost the bourgeois gentilhomme to talk prose. But there are many men who are so constituted that a phrase reaches their ears in as distorted a guise as a reflection cast in an inferior mirror presents itself to their vision. To such there is nothing for it but to make up by assiduous study for defective hearing, and we commend Sir Thomas Wade's tables most earnestly to them. But a great help towards learning the tones would be given to both classes of students by extending the system Sir Thomas Wade adopts of joining together the syllables which make words. The fact that the written characters are monosyllabic has led students to imagine that the spoken language is monosyllabic. This is by no means the case. A single word is often made up of two or more syllables, and when such is the case it should be written as one word. There is no more reason, for example, why the verb Hweilai, "to return," should be written Hwei lai because it is represented by two written characters, than there is that "return" should be written "re turn." Any one whose lot it has been to teach Chinese must be painfully aware of the difficulty of getting students to pronounce a polysyllabic word as one word when they see it written in two or more separate syllables, and the sooner the system is adopted of writing words as whole words the better it will be for both teachers and learners. It is impossible to dwell on the main excellences of Sir Thomas Wade's work in a notice of this length. They can be revealed only by a careful study of every page, and we have no hesitation in saying that the more thorough the study the more will the assertion with which we began this notice, that the book is the best of its kind, be fully vindicated.

THE CAMORRA IN VENICE.*

THERE have been many disputes as to the origin of the word Camorra, and it is employed in different senses in different parts of Italy. In Naples—whence in all probability it came—it denotes a perfectly organized secret society, the objects and methods of which were described in these columns some years ago. In other towns any body of men who unite together to assert illegal rights, or to procure dishonest advantages, is called by the name, and it is in this sense that Mr. Scott uses it. The Camorra of Venice possesses neither the historical interest nor the picturesqueness of that of Naples. It seems from the pamphlet before us to have originated some twenty or thirty years ago, and only to have been in full working order about half that time, and judging from the facts given by the author, it appears to be little more than an organized and somewhat [illegible] form of a state of [illegible] exists in all places which [illegible] of [illegible], and in which [illegible] [illegible] persons.

A number of the [illegible], we are told, [illegible] purpose of excluding all others from the market by paying a high commission to the hotel managers and porters, the gondoliers and the valets de place. As much as sixty per cent. of the sum received is said to be absorbed in this way, so that when twenty per cent. more has been deducted for the dealer's profit, "the other twenty represents the prime cost of the material and workmanship." It is evident that such a system must work injuriously in two ways. It was organized for the purpose of plundering the unwary foreigner, but it has also reduced the wages of the skilled artisan.

An amusing account is given of the ways in which the guides and gondoliers secure their prey, and what may be called living advertisements are employed. The most original idea is that of the gentleman who is a master of several languages, and who joins the train at some small station in the vicinity of Venice. He enters a carriage in which he sees tourists whom he supposes to be gullible and wealthy, makes himself agreeable, gets into conversation, and displays an acquaintance with the city, a considerable knowledge of art, and a special familiarity with the branch of art industry in which his employer is engaged. In the evening he dines in the same hotel as they do, the conversation is continued, and he proposes to show them the chief sights of the place. If the offer is accepted these of course include his patron's workshop.

The account of the efforts which have been made to put an end to abuses which are destroying the trade of Venice, and of their somewhat ludicrous failure, is entertaining and also instructive, as it throws considerable light on one phase of Italian life; but the particulars would not have much interest for English readers. Mr. Scott seems to hope better things from the exertions of the Venice News, a local English paper which has taken up the question, and from a society of guides—he does not give the Italian name—which is disposed to second the exertions of the editor. It certainly would be an advantage to both parties if foreigners could be brought into direct relations with the handicraftsmen; but how this is to be done in these days of hasty travel we confess we do not clearly see. For further information on this and the other subjects mentioned we must refer the reader who is interested in the subject to the pamphlet itself. Every one who is thinking of going to Venice and making purchases there should look it through. He will not find the task difficult, as it is tersely and brightly written.

THE FRENCH STAGE IN THE EIGHTEENTH CENTURY.*

WHETHER at the latter end of the nineteenth century the Comédie Française remains all that it was, the unrivalled centre of histrionic art, is a question which we have not now to argue at length. There was a time when the Théâtre Français attracted and retained as a matter of course all players who distinguished themselves beyond their rivals, and when to write for the Comédie was not so much the passport to fame as the seal of it. As regards the dramatic author, though naturally errors of judgment have been made at times, there have been consistent endeavours on the part of those responsible for the choice of plays to obtain only what was best, and to reject that which did not reach a certain standard; but the ranks of the sociétaires scarcely now contain the full flower of the French stage. Mme. Bernhardt severed her connexion with the famous House some years ago; a successor to Delaunay has not been found—but that is the fault of none but nature, that so very rarely creates Delaunays; M. Coquelin coquettes with the institution, and, admirable as is the work still done there, the names of the existing representatives do not stand out boldly as the names of their predecessors have generally stood. That the glories of the Maison de Molière have passed we are unwilling to believe; its excellent system, on which its reputation was founded, is still preserved; there is no reason why its glories should wane; but it chances that this is not an era of great artists at the Comédie. We can only hope that in the future, when the historian resumes the task which Mr. Hawkins has accomplished as far as the year 1799, there will be a record of the full revival of past splendours in the last decade of the nineteenth century.

Mr. Hawkins has been fortunate in his theme, for the period he describes was in many respects interesting and remarkable. The career of Voltaire is necessarily included. Beaumarchais produced the Barbier de Séville in 1775 and the Mariage de Figaro in 1784; and a brilliant constellation of players whose reputations are still bright aided in building up and strengthening the celebrity of the House. Mr. Hawkins has bestowed no small amount of diligence on his task. He is an enthusiast on behalf of the Comédie, and has produced a narrative which leaves untold few incidents of importance which occurred during the years whose history he traces. Enthusiasm goes for much, and the author is not without a certain competence, though his literary style has its faults and weaknesses. We note with displeasure the occasional lapses into the style of the cheap romancer or of the newspaper scribe. He describes in detail scenes which he has imagined. This gives an air of insincerity to his narrative; and comment on the blunder seems desirable, as it is a mistake into which the inexpert historian often falls. We are told, for instance, that Mlle. Adrienne Lecouvreur's chief pleasure was attending the performance of a tragedy by His Majesty's Players, and that "the blood would rush to her face when they rolled forth the inimitable tirades of Corneille and Racine." "D'Argenson's stern face seemed to become sterner when he heard" a certain complaint. A little further on D'Argenson is described as "probably with a smile on his usually stern countenance," and the first adverb saves the phrase from condemnation. But how does Mr. Hawkins know that the stern face of the lieutenant of police grew sterner on that particular occasion, or that while listening to tragedies at the Théâtre Français Mlle. Lecouvreur exhibited the particular form of emotion he attributes to her? When Mme. Dunoyer was angry, how has he assured himself that she "made the air ring with her reproaches," or that the Marquis de Châteauneuf when angry "trembled from head to foot"? Some of Mr. Hawkins's criticisms are also given with the air of one who speaks that which he knows, whereas we cannot help the suspicion that he is merely retailing the opinion of some one else. Thus he blames the "occasional carelessness of style" of Regnard's comedies; but is this a deliberate conviction formed after a careful study of these works or is it second-hand? If the author had devoted a certain number of weeks to an examination of Regnard, we cannot help suspecting that he would not be content to sum up the result of his labour in a line; if he is quoting he should give his authority.

Beginning with the first year of the eighteenth century, Mr. Hawkins comes to the excommunication of Rousseau from the Café Procope, and a brief but sufficient summary of the production of a number of plays, none of considerable importance, follows. Even thus early natural acting—an avoidance, that is to say, of measured declamation and conventional gesture—had its advocates, though the old school was not shaken till long after. Mr. Hawkins relates an anecdote of Dufresne, none of whose impersonations were without new and telling points, he remarks; and he describes, apparently with admiration, the method in which Dufresne as Pyrrhus recounted the meeting of Andromaque and Astyanax:—

> C'est Hector, disait-elle, en l'embrassant toujours;
> Voila ses yeux, sa bouche, et deja son audace;
> C'est toi-même; c'est toi, cher époux, que j'embrasse;
> Et quelle est sa pensée? &c.

The first three lines were spoken in the soft tones of a woman; in the fourth line he resumed his own voice; and if this were so, we differ totally from Mr. Hawkins's admiration; for this imitative method strikes us as lamentably wrong. English actors of the baser sort have thus spoken the speech of Jacques in As You Like It, but happily at a theatre which had a character to lose it could not be done. The relation of this story does not make us very ready to accept Mr. Hawkins's opinion as a critic of acting. The style of cheap romance to which we have already referred is adopted by the author in his introduction of Voltaire. The early years of François Marie Arouet are carefully traced; several pages are devoted to this subject, not without an air of slyness, as of one who is holding a secret back; and at length it is plainly stated that François Marie Arouet was none other than Voltaire. This might be effective enough if it were conceivable that any reader who is likely to be interested in the career of Voltaire will not be familiar with his real name; but as things are the disclosure of the quasi-secret is rather absurd. Voltaire naturally occupies much space in the book, seeing that he was associated with the Comédie from 1718, when Œdipe was produced, till 1778, which saw the presentation of Irène; and Mr. Hawkins dwells with evident satisfaction on Voltaire's career, having succeeded in persuading himself that his hero has been misrepresented, and that he can set the world right. There are generally at least two views from which a man's actions may be regarded, and in all that concerns Voltaire Mr. Hawkins takes, or invents, a view from which the object of his eulogy appears in the most agreeable light. He has discovered nothing new, he relates nothing that is not perfectly well known, and we certainly do not propose to waste time in argument about a matter so thoroughly well understood as the disposition of Voltaire—nor, indeed, has this subject very much to do with a comment on "the French stage in the eighteenth century."

Infinitely more to the purpose is the author's account of the manner in which what may be called the light of histrionic truth was introduced into the Comédie Française, and conventionality banished, though not without a hard and prolonged struggle. In the present day it seems to us ludicrous that an actor should have any other end in view than the representation of character. We expect him to dress as the man he is representing would have dressed, to speak as he would have spoken, and, in short, to merge his own identity in that of the personage he is supposed to be. In days when the ancient heroes of Greece and Rome were attired in the Court dress of Louis XV. it is not strange that incongruities were little regarded. It was Marmontel who persuaded Clairon to adopt a natural method of speech and action, though we hope he did not address her in the words which Mr. Hawkins attributes to him on p. 22 of his second volume, and we think that Marmontel would have expressed his meaning somewhat more clearly and in accordance with the simplicity which he desired to inculcate. She replied that he was evidently determined not to let her rest till she had assumed a familiar and comic line in tragedy; but she was too sensible not to be influenced by his arguments:—

> Suddenly, in the course of an engagement at Bordeaux, she resolved to try the effect of what he recommended. In her own words, it had the greatest success, murmurs of "mais cela est beau!" being raised in the first scene. On her return she had to play Roxane before the Court at Versailles. Marmontel went to see her at her toilette. "Yes," she said, after relating her experience at Bordeaux, "and I am going to try the new style here. If I succeed as well, farewell to my old declamation." Marmontel did not fail to see the performance. "The event," he writes, "surpassed our expectations. It was no longer the actress, it was Roxane herself, whom the audience thought they heard. The surprise, the illusion, the enchantment was extreme. Paris hailed the novelty with equal warmth; the actress found increasing inducement to keep her word, and another invigorating influence made itself felt in the theatre.

Clairon's conversion brought about further results. She felt that it was impossible to adopt the new style in the preposterous dresses she had been accustomed to wear, and soon after, discarding the huge hoop and the fantastic frippery in which she had hitherto played Electra, she "appeared in the simple habit of a slave, her hair dishevelled, her arms loaded with long chains." From this she proceeded to do what is still done, and became "an unwearying student of statues, monuments, and portraits in old manuscripts"; and by degrees her example was followed. Lekain discarded the conventional mode, and played Oreste in something like a Grecian costume. Dauberval approved, and declared that next time he played a Roman he would have a somewhat similar dress, which was at any rate a step in the right direction. It is strange that a system so truthful should ever have been abandoned; but some forty years afterwards a Phèdre was seen at the Comédie in the approved Republican costume of the period (1794), and Mr. Hawkins quotes Fleury to the effect that "the literati of the Commune would have wished to decorate Mahomet with the tri-coloured cockade." All this, however, was quite independent of art; the players were only anxious to avert from themselves suspicion that they were not warm supporters of the Revolution.

Mr. Hawkins is good enough to give us his idea of English politics in the seventeenth century, as well as of French dramatic art in the eighteenth; so, at least, we gather from his comment on Duclairon's Cromwell. It dealt, he tells us, not with the execution of Charles I., but with the bitterness of faction that arose after the destruction of the Monarchy. "Exaggerated as that bitterness of faction was by the author," Mr. Hawkins remarks, "some thought it preferable to the grinding tyranny it followed." Others did not; but, on reflection, does it not occur to Mr. Hawkins that the intrusion of his eulogy of the English Revolution is a trifle gratuitous and out of place in a history of the French stage? A little more regard for accuracy may also be advised. Thus on p. 191 of the first volume we are told that Paul Poisson had purchased a lieutenancy of infantry for his son François, and on p. 172 we find the young man described as "the erstwhile cavalry officer." It does not matter at the present day whether François Poisson fought on foot or horseback; but one hesitates in accepting without verification statements of an author who can be so careless as this.

ANTIQUARIAN MISCELLANIES.*

THE second series of Dr. Howard's Miscellanea commences with a volume containing some excellent illustrations. We have examples in facsimile of grants of arms, old book-plates, tombstones, and monuments, all well and clearly engraved; but perhaps the most interesting article is one relating to the assignment of arms to Shakspeare and Arden. This was made to the dramatist's father in 1596, and is in the College of Arms. Mr. Tucker, the late Somerset Herald, in his note on the subject, assumes that William Shakspeare was his father's agent with the London authorities; and adds, "we seem to touch his hand when holding the very documents he must have held." In the draft assignment written by Dethick, the name is spelled "Shakespere" at least three times; in another paper giving the arms in "trick," the name is "Shakespeare"; while in a very carefully written note as to other coats-of-arms of a similar character it is again "Shakespere." This form, therefore, would appear to be the most correct.

The second volume, although it contains nothing so interesting as this "Shakespere Grant," shows no signs of flagging, and is full of out-of-the-way information, much of it useless, no doubt, if entertaining, but much also of considerable historical value. The fine reproductions of heraldic achievements, and especially those of the Tucher family, of Nuremberg, after Albert Dürer and Lucas Cranach, greatly add to the attractions of the volume. It is, in fact, scarcely possible to dip into it anywhere without bringing up something worth noting. At p. 239, for instance, we find the marriage licence of James Woodcock and Margaret Damn, of St. Andrew's, Holborn, in 1750. Their son took the name of Croft. At p. 198 we have in the registers of Christ Church, Oxford, continued from the first volume, five references to "Samuel Fell, Dr. Prebend," the famous "Dr. Fell" who was not liked. At p. 191 we meet with a very curious Christian name. Thomas Hatch, of Heselbury, Wilts, married, about the year 1620, Lady, daughter of William Filiol, of Knight Street, in Dorsetshire. Titles as Christian names are prohibited by law, if we [illegible] greatly [illegible] and some thirty years ago a clergyman was [illegible] tried for refusing to baptize a child "Sir Francis [illegible]," and was justified by the Court. This volume contains some [illegible] engravings of monuments, among which the best is one in Wotton Church, in Surrey. It represents Elizabeth, the wife of Edward Darcie, who died at the early age of twenty, in 1634. She is sculptured at half-length, leaning over her dead child, and saying:—

> Here sleeps my babe in silence, Heaven's her rest,
> For God takes soonest those Hee loveth best.

The epitaph on herself instructs the reader not to weep for her:—

> Whose pious spending of her youthfull yeares
> Deserves thy imitation, not thy teares.

Certainly the rural poets of the seventeenth century understood the art and mistery of making epitaphs.

The Staffordshire Collections are of a very solid character. The present volume opens with a series of notes on the military service performed by Staffordshire tenants during the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries, drawn up from the still existing writs of protection issued in favour of those who, having, perhaps, actions at law pending against them, could not protect their property during their absence with the army. The notes begin with 1230, the fourteenth year of Henry III., when sixteen Staffordshire soldiers took out writs of protection. The original documents are in the Public Record Office, and the abstracts here given have been collected and annotated by General Wrottesley, the honorary secretary of the William Salt Archæological Society, by which the volume is issued. A chartulary of the Priory of St. Thomas the Martyr, near Stafford, collected and edited from original manuscripts by Mr. F. Parker, follows, and the volume is completed by a history of the Manor of Castre, or Castle Church, also known as the Manor of Stafford, the seat of the barons of that name. This strictly scientific paper is a mine of information, manorial, genealogical, municipal, and ecclesiastical. It is by Mr. Mazzinghi, and is a good example of the new method in which such investigations are conducted. There is an appendix of original documents, and a separate index for each paper in the volume.

Mr. Renton's book on Heraldry does not add anything to our knowledge, but may form a handy volume for coach-painters and other professional heralds. The illustrations are in a very good style, and there is an excellent glossarial index.

NOVELS.*

THE Rebel Rose—it is, of course, the white rose of the Pretender—belongs to the school of novels founded by Benjamin D'Israeli. It takes for its groundwork a well-known political situation and invents an imaginary parallel. How far it is legitimate for an author to create an interest in his work by introducing real people in the most transparent disguise, and violently distorting their characters to suit his own political views, or the exigencies of the story, is a question which others must decide. In the first paragraph of The Rebel Rose we make the acquaintance of a heroine "with the magic of an historic cause clinging about her," described by Lady Saxon, who ends by playing the part of her evil genius, as "looking like a cross between a lady horse-breaker and Mary, Queen of Scots." To more friendly eyes Miss Beaton was young, beautiful, taller than the ordinarily tall woman, and remarkably like the luckless Mary Stuart. Her dress was designed to enhance the resemblance. She wore "a clinging robe of black velvet, which fell in straight wide folds from the waist. The stiff, long bodice, made with a sort of modern adaptation of the old-fashioned stomacher; the rosary and cross hanging from the girdle; the bonnet peaked in front, and edged with large jet beads; the full lace ruffle—all harmonized with a face startlingly Stuart in outline, and not without the proverbial Stuart melancholy." Mary Stuart Beaton, for thus is the more than ordinarily tall girl named, has, it seems, a right to the Stuart outline and the proverbial Stuart melancholy, for "she starts from Henrietta Maria, Duchess of Orleans, who, according to scandalous chronicles, was poisoned by her husband. Henrietta Maria left a daughter, married to a Prince of Savoy. Miss Beaton's mother, through whom her Stuart blood runs, was a Bavarian Princess, and she married an Englishman" (Scotchman?), "Lord Beaton, a Legitimist, a Tory of the old school, of the 'Divine right,' 'Church and King' order." But for the Act of Succession, therefore, Miss Beaton would be Queen of England, and has, in the opinion of her limited number of adherents, a Divine right to the throne, which right they have, on the whole, decided not to obtrude on public notice until a wave of true faith should sweep back heretic England to Roman Catholicism and allegiance to the dynasty which was identified with it. Miss Beaton, or as she is called by her own little court, Princess Mary, has come to this country to claim an estate which was left to the Stuart family by some devoted adherent shortly before the death of Queen Anne, and was seized for the crown by the Hanoverian Ministers. Being determined that her surroundings shall be in harmony with herself and the cause which she represents, Princess Mary's adherents—whose ideas on the subject seem to have been a little "mixed"—long taken for her an early Georgian house in Kensington (we almost think that in which Thackeray lived), and have filled it with early Georgian furniture. On her arrival she at once "assumes an attitude of separateness from the Hanoverians." To be presented at Court would be recognition of the Hanoverian family; so lonely state is kept up in the Georgian house, and sometimes the contrast between Miss Beaton's position and her pretensions, and we regret to say her manners, is so great, that we are inclined to say more americano with Lord Saxon, "Don't call her a Princess, please. She isn't any Princess!" As for Lady Saxon, she is beautiful. She, too, is more than common tall, and she has "neck and arms of the heroic size," and "lives in an atmosphere of sensuous emotion, which she carries with her wherever she goes." Arms of the heroic size would certainly be needed if she did. "Her looks, her movements, her figure, her voice—all gave out with them that bewitching sense of womanhood, of woman's sex, which is so magnetic to the temper of a young man. The quietest, most ordinary words she spoke seemed to ask the man whom she was addressing, "Why don't you make love to me? I know you are longing to do it. I look into your eyes with mine and I read all your feelings there. Come, make love to me! I shall not be angry. You may get nothing else by it, but at least you shall not get a scolding nor a lecture on morality." This most unpleasant lady develops into the approved penny-dreadful female villain of title, suffers from geysers of passion, kicks her clothing about the room, stamps on it, works up a crazy lover of Mary Stuart Beaton's to play the part of Bothwell, and betrays every one all round. We will not tell more of the story. As a story it is melodramatic stuff. Lady Saxon especially is a creature of melodrama; and what can be more unnatural and disagreeable than the incident of Miss Beaton's going to an East-End music-hall "in her boy's clothes," in order to judge of the true condition of the poor, or the silvery peal of laughter with which she receives the remonstrances of the man she loved on this escapade? "Did the dress not become me? Did I not make a pretty boy?" says this daughter of a thousand kings, who smokes cigarettes at a music-hall, and keeps boy's clothes by her. On the other hand, what can be sweeter and more womanly than her behaviour in other scenes, and what can be happier than the conception of Lord Stonehenge's character? He is throughout a noble, high-minded Catholic gentleman.

If any one feels that he would be amused by hearing the adventures of "The Pipley Family in Europe," and how they conveyed their luggage to depôts, and obtained their square meals, and bore the sight of their "sixpences going bang" in England, France, and Italy; and how Miss Matilda spoke the "ridiculous language which all French people seem to have at their fingers' ends; and by what process she arrived at finding it right to say, "Conductoor, commong long faisons-nous boucher ici?" for "How long do we stay here?"; and how, in spite of her not being able to speak the "Eyetalian" language with equal correctness and facility, and in spite of their fear of Mr. Garibaldi and the band of brigands he commanded, Mr. Pipley went to Italy, paying his way with lire and calling them liars, because he wanted to see the ruin of one Pompey and Mr. Massaniello; how, when visiting the grotto of "Possilipo" and the tomb of Virgil, Mr. Pipley inquired if Virgil was an American who had died in Naples and been buried there, and Miss Matilda saw nothing wonderful in the Amphitheatre of Nero, because she had a dog called Nero at home, and her father supposed that the Temple of Mercury had been used for quicksilver works; and how, when they went on to Rome, they were angry because the Baths of Caracalla had no water in them, and regarded the "Houses" of the Cæsars as a fraud, because there was not one habitable bedroom or bed in them—if, as beforesaid, any human being exist who can be amused by this, let him read Deacon Hope's very dull American stories.

Broken Wings is got up in rather a funereal manner and is somewhat dreary reading. Why do so many of the people who lay the scene of their stories in France think that conversations will be more in keeping if given in a style which reads like a bad translation from the French? Many will like to be taken back to the time when they were "joyous and free from blame," and read the Seven Champions of Christendom by such an opening to a chapter as "The first heralds of the dawn were already hanging out their banners in the East before," &c. &c.; but who will care to be told that "the French peasant is almost as unenlightened in his faith as if the whole fabric of superstition was not pierced with the shafts of inquisition, nor lighted with the lamp of investigation"?

Amelia Jane's Ambition is a humble one, and, so it seems to us, is that of the very able writer of this little book. It is so lifelike, so absolutely true to nature, that we cannot help regretting that Mr. Onslow has not taken the pains to choose or fashion a more telling story; and having said this, we have uttered the only complaint it is possible to make. The ways of the honest poor, their dislike of having their poverty known, of being beholden to their neighbours, their odd reticences and occasional tongue-tiedness, the extreme delicacy which often characterizes their dealings with each other, their generous and frequently self-sacrificing kindness and generosity to each other, the low level on which they pitch their praise of husbands or children who are the pride of their lives, are all given here, and often with much quaintness and humour. "Not a bad girl ain't Amelia Jane," was all that Susan Bainbridge would ever say of her quick-witted, ready-handed daughter of fourteen, who saw openings for every one, and capabilities in everything, and, as Susan said, was "so upsettin'. I can't think where she got it from; I was always quiet, and her father is a very quiet man." Susan's unwritten law of etiquette that baby's health is to be inquired about before other subjects are introduced is amusing. We have a great liking for Eliza Jane, who soon "gets on intimate terms with the pump," and finds work with a Mrs. Merry, a laundress; and, being told by that functionary that she has not many shirt-fronts to do, because "Roun' about here it's most collars and cuffs, clerks and shopmen," remarks, "And ain't you found that it's them that has no shirt-fronts as is the most vexatious about the collars and cuffs?" Having found work herself, Eliza sets up her brother with a "barrer" stocked with "tartyses" to sell. Billy asks the question we were inclined to ask ourselves—"Wot's tartyses?" "They're a sort o' beast," said Amelia Jane; "on'y the worrit is you can't get them to put their heads out." Finally Mrs. Merry, who has been ten days "out of a gal, and keeps puttin' orf looking for one, because you gives eighteenpence and you takes in rubbidge, and you turns out rubbidge," engages Amelia Jane, and both are delighted with the bargain. Amelia Jane is to have an "outin', as far as where they gets the milk." This is how she approaches the difficult question of attire. "Mother, there's somethink I was a wantin' to arst you for," she said rather shyly. "I seed in a shop in the High Street a black straw hat. It's fourpence 'alfpenny, redooced from shilling and an 'alfpenny. It's a real beauty; and I took notice that the brim is sewed quite tight and strong. Mother, do you think as I might buy it?" "Surelie," said mother, and presented her forthwith with sixpence. "You are good, mother! And, mother, would you trim it for me? You do it so tasty. I mind me of a bonnet you had when I was little. There were a blue ribbon on it with yaller spots, and you had twisted it in and out, most uncommon."

SOMERSETSHIRE ARCHÆOLOGICAL SOCIETY.*

FOR many years the annual volumes of the Proceedings of the Somersetshire Archæological and Natural History Society ranked among the best publications of their kind. Unfortunately they have of late scarcely maintained their old character. Last year, indeed, the volume was fairly good. It contained the report of a meeting at Yeovil, where some satisfactory work seems to have been done. The volume was, however, degraded by a silly and offensive paper on the "Hagiology of Somerset," a subject that would well repay scholarly treatment; it is treated in the Society's Journal in a tone of ignorant buffoonery. This year we have the report of a meeting at Bristol; for last year the Society for the second time crossed the lower Avon. The results of this excursion appear to have been singularly small, considering the large number of objects of archæological and architectural interest in Bristol and its immediate neighbourhood. Mr. John Taylor, the City librarian, did what he could to make the meeting profitable; though we are surprised to find so careful a local antiquary ascribing the first charter of Bristol to the year 1162. The charter was witnessed by Roger, Earl of Hereford, who died in 1155. Seyer, who is no doubt primarily responsible for the error, evidently misread Thomas Cancellarius as Thomas Cantuariensis. It seems that the Dean and Chapter have been "restoring" the famous Norman Gateway of St. Augustine's Abbey, the present cathedral church; though when we last saw it some two years ago it was certainly in no danger of falling, and therefore in no need of any restoration. The so-called restoration excited the righteous anger of Canon Venables, of Lincoln, who denounced it as "nothing less than an act of Vandalism." The cause of the Dean and Chapter was taken up by the Mayor, but his indignant answer was scarcely a satisfactory defence. As far as we can make out from the Society's Proceedings, the Dean and Chapter have been pulling down an old building which stood against one side of the gateway, and which they had probably better have left alone. When they had done this, they found that they had exposed a portion of the gateway, which had lost its original architectural ornaments; and so they set their architect and stonecutters to patch Robert Fitzharding's work with nineteenth-century imitations. It seems impossible to teach people that they have no business to tamper with ancient and noble buildings in this fashion. A mayor may perhaps be excused for not understanding this; it is a different and a far more serious matter when the clergy of a cathedral church show themselves equally ignorant of the principles on which they should treat the buildings committed to their charge. The only paper in the volume of any special value is a dissertation by Professor Lloyd Morgan on the nature and probable sources of the huge stones that form the circles at Stanton Drew. Some seventy-five pages are devoted to a reprint of Leland's notes on the county, and the last paper consists of a long and rambling account of a highly respectable gentleman lately deceased, who does not appear to have been remarkable for any literary or antiquarian tastes. In a kind of appendix the Rev. J. A. Bennett, Rector of South Cadbury, records an interesting discovery. His church is dedicated to St. Thomas of Canterbury, and he has found at the east end of the south aisle a wall-painting in red and black, representing a figure wearing a mitre, which he takes to be the figure of St. Thomas. We observe that Mr. Bennett, who has done some good work for the Commissioners on Historical Manuscripts at Wells and elsewhere, has been elected Secretary of the Society, and we have no doubt that he will succeed in bringing back its volumes of Proceedings to the high level of bygone days.

FORD'S HANDBOOK FOR SPAIN.*

FORD'S Handbook of Spain (so originally entitled, and not "for Spain") is one of those rare books of the world, written with fulness of love and knowledge, which can never be out of date. Other handbooks deteriorate as they grow old. Of this one the oldest form is still the best, and will continue to be read long after the information it gives to the traveller is useless. The first Ford—the only Ford, to those who value the book for its own sake rather than as a railway companion—the edition of 1845, in two volumes, is a treasure beyond price, a possession for ever, whose value years cannot affect. What though it may be true, as is said in the preface to this new and improved Handbook in one volume, that "the general introduction of railways throughout Spain, the improvement of roads and circulation of steamers along the coasts, and the establishment of sufficiently comfortable hotels, have revolutionized the mode of travelling"—still, for those who would know Spain thoroughly, there is no book but Ford, and no Ford but the original—untouched by the hand of the reviser, and unadapted for those who journey by train and circulate in steamers. A great deal of what is the essence of Ford's Handbook, as the judicious collector well knows, has been omitted from all subsequent editions, either from an over-nice delicacy or a too curious regard for Spanish sentiment. The wit, the learning, the humour, the lively sense of patriotism, mingled with an exquisite and never-equalled appreciation of the character of the country and the people—all these, the distinguishing qualities of the first edition, have been sadly mangled and ruthlessly cut down in the later issues. Doubtless these later are most useful, and, if it is the object of a handbook for travellers to tell you how to go to places, which are the most convenient routes and the best hotels, what is the shortest time in which you can "do" Granada, Seville, and the Escorial, and the Madrid Gallery, the modern voyager had better not trust to the Ford of 1845. Since then a great deal has happened in Spain. The journeys on horse or mule-back, so joyously described and so lovingly dwelt upon by Ford, with bota and alforjas, are still the most delightful, may the only, way of seeing the country to understand it, but are no longer necessary. The introduction of railways has rendered the traveller independent of those minute instructions for his comfort and safety on the road which fill so large a part in Ford's first Handbook. He may do the round from Irun to Port Bou without ever seeing a venta or tasting a puchero. He will travel about almost as rapidly as in France, and will meet with no more adventures than on the road from London to Perth. He is no more likely (perhaps less) to meet a brigand than if he were in the Regent's Park. In his French or Swiss hotel he need trouble himself no more about his fare than in Burgundy or in the Oberland. He will hardly miss the odour of garlic, but he may keep his mouth uncontaminated by the national herb. The lessons in manners, the hints on deportment, and the rules of society, which form so pleasant and fruitful a subject of discourse in Ford, who shall say that they are required by the modern traveller in Spain? It is not that there has really been any great change during the last forty years, either in the country or in the people. The greater part of what Ford has written is true to this day. The traveller has only to go a few miles off the main lines of railway to find the Spain which Ford describes. In New Castile and in Estremadura are districts still untouched by the hand of progress, with cities and manners of men just as they were two hundred years ago. In La Mancha are wilds such as are scarcely to be matched in Europe for their primitive savagery, where one might still meet with adventures "up to the elbows," if there were any adventurers about. In Estremadura there is nothing new but the Guardia Civil. Those who desire to know what is permanent and essential in the Spanish character; those who would have a true picture of the face of the country; those who are curious in Spanish art, in Spanish architecture, in Spanish cookery, and in the many strange forms of Spanish religion, can have no more agreeable, intelligent, or learned guide than Richard Ford.

Still, it must be admitted that the exigencies of modern travel have rendered a new edition of the famous Handbook necessary, and, however we may grieve at the loss of much delightful reading—sometimes profane, but always profound, with a good deal of honest praise of the Duke of Wellington and his never-to-be-sufficiently-extolled behaviour in the Peninsula, and of righteous indignation at the too-much-forgotten rascalities of the French marshals—the modern traveller in Spain requires his information in a more compact form, adapted to the age of railways. To meet his commonplace wants the Handbook, from two volumes, has been reduced in this edition to one. Some of the other changes scarcely seem to us to be improvements. The information about hotels, restaurants, &c., which has hitherto appeared in the body of the work, as usual in Mr. Murray's guide-books, is now transferred to the index at the end of the volume—an arrangement which overloads the index, while tending to give unnecessary trouble to the voyager. To find all about any town one has now to look in two places—first, to where the town is mentioned in the text, with its history, geography, &c.; and, secondly, to the index for a list of the hotels, the cab fares, and even the steamer and diligence routes. Some of the paragraphs, rent from their place in the old Handbook, read awkwardly in the abridged text, which has been all dislocated to suit the new arrangement by railway routes. Some of the new matter does not always fit into the old. The account of Spanish literature is meagre, and in the list of authors are some curious omissions and some blunders for which, perhaps, the printer is responsible. The Rabbi Don Sem Tob for the Rabbi Don Santob is rather a bad shot. Nor will the traveller be greatly enlightened by being told that there are "two poems on The Cid," and that "the best of these is the one beginning 'El mio Cid' (vide Ticknor)." Guzman de Alfarache and El Escudero Marcos de Obregon can hardly be assigned to the sixteenth century. To say of Quevedo that "he was an excellent theological moralist and fantastical writer in the manner of Dante," is to give a very odd description of that quaintest and most original of humourists. Among the poets of the nineteenth century there is found no place for Trueba. In literature, indeed, the new Handbook is not very strong, which is a curious last stage of a book which owes all its fame to its literary merit. Even so well known a name as that of Don Pascual de Gayangos is misspelt Gaycagos. In the historical part, so long as the original text of Ford is adhered to, as it seems to be throughout, there is nothing to complain of. The topography, except along the principal lines of railway, is very little altered. Tomelloso, which has lately risen into importance as the centre of the wine-trade with Bordeaux—the greater part of the claret of commerce being here produced, as well as the best of the brandy of Cognac—a town of over ten thousand inhabitants, the largest in La Mancha, though in the index, is only casually mentioned as the place where the Guadiana drops underground. Of Argamasilla it surely might have been said, even though Ford strangely forgot to say it, that this was the native village of Don Quixote. On the other hand, Ford's wild statement that "here Cervantes is said to have written his Don Quixote" might have been corrected from more modern authorities. In regard to the directions for a two days' excursion from Argamasilla, through the Don Quixote country, to the Cueva de Montesinos and the Campo de Montiel, we would advise the enthusiast not to attempt it from Argamasilla, where—that is, in the town, which is nearer ten than six miles (as here said) from the station so-called—there is no decent sleeping-place. The best way is to hire a trap to Tomelloso, which is only a few miles further, with a rough but clean posada of primitive but civil ways, where the traveller, if garlic proof, will find accommodation and conveyance. In default of a horse or mule, which is not always to be hired in these out-of-the-way places, where only some half a dozen English travellers have been seen, perhaps, since the time of Cervantes, a carrillo, or country cart, may be procured, with a mule equal to do the journey to the Cave of Montesinos and back in one long day. The roads are terrible, so long as there is any road at all; but the trip is full of interest, and might not always be devoid of adventure.

While noticing the defects in this new edition of the Handbook for Spain, most of which are inseparable from any abridgment of Ford, it is only fair to say that it has some new features which are most commendable. For the first time we have a number of well-executed plans of Spanish cities, including towns so little frequented as Oviedo, Merida, and Cuenca, which cannot but be most useful to the traveller, who is far more often at a loss for a plan of the town than for a map of the country. There are plans also of the principal cathedrals, though unfortunately among them is not one of the cathedral of Tarragona, one of the most beautiful and interesting in all Spain. Lastly, it must be conceded that the traveller gains something in having his Handbook in one volume instead of two, even though the convenience is purchased by the sacrifice of nearly all that gave value to Richard Ford's Handbook of Spain.

CALENDAR OF STATE PAPERS, DOMESTIC SERIES, 1641–1643.*

THOUGH duly prepared for the comparative meagreness of the remains calendared in this volume, we confess to having been taken by surprise by the extent of ground which it covers. It is an ill wind, and so forth; and since the Master of the Rolls, being in a sense editor-in-chief of this monumental series, must, like all editors, have conciseness at heart, he may be congratulated on the issue of a volume dealing with a period almost as long as that which occupied not fewer than four of its predecessors. But, as Mr. Hamilton reminds us, if relatively small, the harvest is also more miscellaneous; and his preface, marked by his usual ability, this time furnishes a doubly welcome guidance through a mass of documents which illustrates numerous aspects of a period of almost incomparable importance in our history, without, in any one case adding very amply to our resources. We only wish that the editor had in the present instance even more largely referred in his preface itself to specially interesting documents in his Calendar, a kind of reference specially valuable to students. Of course, both editor and readers now have the inestimable additional advantage of the aid of Mr. Gardiner, whose "lighter labours," as he is pleased to call them, have naturally enough again, though to no very great extent, outstripped Mr. Hamilton's slower, but not less sure, march.

The dearth of more or less authentic correspondence addressed to the Secretaries of State is in this period supplied (after a fashion) from a very different quarter. At the end of Mr. Hamilton's new volume we find, for the first time in this series of Calendars, a list, as yet far from lengthy, of the newspapers preserved among the State papers of the year 1643, with a brief synopsis of their contents. This "Newspaper Collection I." begins with the Mercurius Aulicus, a print presumably written like Thackeray's Pall Mall Gazette, "by gentlemen for gentlemen," though Mr. Gardiner is constrained to stigmatize its editor, albeit a fellow of All Souls, as utterly untrustworthy in his vocation. But the peculiar charm of newspaper information has always consisted in the fact that the contradiction which it frequently deserves it rarely fails to obtain; and here we have on the opposite side the Mercurius Civicus, who tells the truth from London and from the London point of view, in order "to prevent mis-information"—from Oxford. Another Parliamentary organ in the list is the Weekly Account, which opens its first number with a paragraph containing "Six satisfying reasons in answer to Mercurius Aulicus, who alleged that the Parliament have no just grounds to raise an army, but through fears and jealousies." The same print in a later number indignantly contradicts the report that Pym died of that loathsome disease which the Greeks call "phthiriasis," and to which, by the way, popular imagination, always profoundly exercised on such matters, has attributed the death of more than one prominent personage. Anti-Aulicus, established on similar "principles," is represented only by a single number, which is extremely sarcastic against the Royalist journal's dislike of a Parliamentary ordinance reserving the houses of delinquents and ill-affected persons for the benefit and use of the Commonwealth. But the most important of the journals opposed to the Mercurius Aulicus was the Mercurius Britannicus, of which the series here calendared begins with No. 11 (November 1643). Its editor, the notorious Marchamont Needham, who afterwards changed sides and started the Mercurius Pragmaticus against the Commonwealth and Oliver Cromwell, is well known to the readers of Mr. Masson. (It is, we trust, only our ignorance that is puzzled by Mr. Hamilton's reference to Mason's [sic] Short Life of Milton.) Finally, The Scottish Dove, a sweetly, but not too appropriately named periodical, seems to have been established to further the policy of the Solemn League and Covenant, and to "improve" the effect created in both Scotland and England by the rumoured understanding between King Charles and the Irish—"there are ten or twelve ships at Bristol ready rigged, and going out to fetch over rebels from Ireland"; but the Scotch are prepared for speedy action, if God permit, and if "advance money" be forthcoming.

The simultaneous circulation in London of so many political journals, taken together with what we know of the activity of the pamphlet literature of the age in which Milton thought it no condescension to become a publicist, helps to explain the steadfast adherence of the City to the Parliamentary cause during the first, and in point of fact the most critical, period of the war. There seems no reason to suppose that the hopes which Charles I. entertained of securing the support of public opinion in his capital ever had any solid foundation. But it is undeniable that, in the days before the rupture definitively declared itself, the City, as Mr. Hamilton puts it, virtually held in its grasp the fate of the contending parties. "It will appear," he says, "from the papers in this volume that most of the questions which then divided the nation were first threshed out in the Common Council and in the pulpits of the City before they were introduced into Parliament." The King's personal appeal to the sympathies of the Londoners was not so much ill-timed as ill-founded. It was made on November 25th, 1641, a week before the presentation to him of the Grand Remonstrance, and three days after the House of Commons, torn asunder by an irremediable schism, had voted that declaration by little more than a bare majority. Now, if ever, at the moment when new parties must form themselves, and when a reaction had clearly shown itself against the violence of the policy personified in "King Pym," was the time for calling upon the friends of the Throne. But the mistake lay in supposing that the City would dance as the Lord Mayor and aldermen piped, and that the Ovatio Carolina amounted to a proof of real popularity. The King's speech fell short even of the recommendations submitted to Secretary Nicholas, and very soon petitions and deputations showed to which side the feeling of London really inclined. One of the many correspondents of Sir John Pennington, the "very honest" commander of the Channel Fleet, whose "perplexity," so graphically described by Clarendon, made it imperative on him to keep himself well informed, relates how Parliament was "tumultuously solicited" by the "ruder sort of people," and how, in the following week, "some of the better sort of the same faction came in good numbers to the House, accoutred in the best manner they could, and in coaches, to prevent the aspersion that they were of the basest sort of people only which were that way affected." The special purpose of this demonstration, so alien in form to more recent manifestations of the party of movement in London, was to checkmate the Lord Mayor. Sir Richard Gurney, more Royalist than ever since he had been baronetted or was morally assured of his baronetcy, had given just offence by taking precautions, as against a mere prelude to a riot, against the proposed forwarding of a petition for the removal from the House of Lords of "Popish lords and bishops." What wonder that such apprehensions enhanced the importance attached, both in and out of Parliament, to the beatings of the City pulse; enough almost to warrant the satire of the squib-writer who represented the Houses as moved by the agitation east of Temple Bar concerning the approach of doomsday. As is well known, when the King's heroic attempt—heroic, because it did not shrink even from ridicule—to arrest the Five Members had been made and failed, the genuine sentiments of the City declared themselves unmistakably enough; and when, on January 5th, 1642, the King paid what was really his last visit to Guildhall, it was the cry of "Privilege of Parliament" which filled his unwilling ears. Captain Slingsby, who reports this to Admiral Pennington, adds that, when a loyal bystander, indignant at this cry having been shouted in the King's ears by a bold fellow in the lowest rank standing upon a form, called out, "Observe the man; apprehend him!"—the King mildly replied, "I have and will observe all privileges of Parliament; but no privileges can protect a traitor from a legal trial"; and so departed. We note, by the way, that, with reference to the attempted arrest, Mr. Hamilton unhesitatingly adopts the highly probable conclusion formed by Mr. Gardiner that the warning sent to the House of Commons at the last moment came from the French ambassador, La Ferté, and that he took no more credit than was his due in reporting to Mazarin:—"J'avois prévenu mes amis, et ils s'étoient mis en sûreté." The name of Lady Carlisle, whose previous message was so strangely neglected by the members, occurs but a single time in this volume, although its central figure is that of Pym, and then only in the postscript to a letter already printed in the Camden Miscellany. On p. 225, however, in the purely tentative manner which becomes an editor of materials from which conjecture must be apt to spring with unsought readiness, Mr. Hamilton summarizes as follows a ciphered letter from Parma, without date, "signed 'Fugitive' [Father Philips?], to some lady [possibly the Countess of Carlisle]":—

I could wish you were here out of those turmoils. I am sorry to hear things are gone so far as they are; glad if I might help you. I doubt not but you standing firm all things may be soon quieted, though others tongues have done you no little dishonour. Be sure you keep secret your often night visits heretofore at St. James's, for though the knowledge thereof cannot wrong your person, it may give suspicion of dishonesty in the minds of the vulgar. Lastly, hold this for a maxim, that it is better to suffer some disease with honour and reputation than for hope of a little liberty by a weak resistance to incur the hazard of a direct downfall or eternal infamy.

Of Father Robert Philips, the confessor of Henrietta Maria, who, after playing so active a part in England as to be imprisoned in the Tower, accompanied the Queen abroad, we cannot profess to know more than Mr. Gardiner has told us; and we are therefore unable to measure the full hazardousness of Mr. Hamilton's suggestions. Had that remarkable woman, Lucy, Countess of Carlisle, adorned the Court of Mary de' Medici or of Louis XIII., what wealth of psychological analysis would have been expended upon her character and career by the brilliant author of Études sur les femmes illustres du XVII^me siècle! As it is, we have to content ourselves with the jottings of the late Mr. Jesse, which so afflicted the critical temper of his contemporary, the late Mr. Croker; and we suppose that the "Erinnys of her time," as he states Bishop Warburton to have styled Lady Carlisle, is unlikely to find a more formal biographer.

As already observed, the contents of the volume before us are varied to an unusual degree; and we cannot do more in conclusion than advert to one or two matters on which they throw incidental light. Mr. Hamilton points out in his preface that the first formal recognition of the principle of ministerial responsibility, by the introduction of the practice that all legal documents emanating from the Crown should be countersigned by a Secretary of State or other responsible minister, dates from about the commencement of the Long Parliament. According to a MS. note by Sir Joseph Williamson, when Under-Secretary of State in the reign of Charles II., there were countersignings already in 1641 and 1642, and he seems to have doubted whether the Order dated Oxford, October 10, 1643, of which the transcript is calendared in this volume, was that actually made. Its significance is certainly not overrated by Mr. Hamilton, inasmuch as it declares "that any warrant not subscribed by one of our Secretaries, or some other officer whose proper place it is to procure and sign such particular belonging to their office, shall be understood as unduly obtained. We command our Secretaries to subscribe all letters, warrants, and writings which they shall procure us, the King, to sign." But, though a strong security might thus seem to have been gained against concessions and monopolies, such as had disgraced the earlier Stuart times, ways and means were found after the Restoration for evading this check upon royal prodigality. And, after all, the step was still considerable to the assertion of Ministerial responsibility for every public act of the Crown whatsoever, which Hallam at first thought himself unable to trace back further than a speech made by the Duke of Argyle in 1739, but afterwards found very distinctly asserted by the Earl of Rochester (Laurence Hyde) in 1711.

As a matter of course, church affairs form the subject of a large number of the papers in this volume, since it nearly covers the period in which the attempt to overthrow the constitution of the Church of England was formally completed under the cool and calculating guidance of Pym, moved in this matter (as it is not uncharitable to conclude) by political considerations only or mainly. That the support which made his undertaking possible was not altogether of a moral nature might be deduced from the proportion of time-servers to be found at any time in any community. But how it proved possible for certain clergymen of the Church of England to hold their livings very comfortably whatever the Westminster Assembly, or, for that matter, whatever in later days the Committee for the Propagation of the Gospel might resolve, is apparent from the following description, peradventure a little overdrawn, by a parishioner at issue with his parson about tithe and poll-money:—

Sure if he would believe what a turncoat his nephew is, he would at last leave off to support him. I have long since told him of his doctrine, do me the favour to tell him in my name that . . . the great conformist to the Church discipline a year since, that would more than threaten with the High Commission any man who, but out of inadvertence, neglected to stand at the Creed, Gloria Patri, Gospel, &c., or bow at the name of Jesus, who would not be seen in a pulpit without a surplice, who was diligent as well as his untoward body would give him leave to bow to the Altar, who among his libellous, scandalous, and base articles in the High Commission against me, accused me of speaking against the jurisdiction of Bishops, is now come to that pass that he reproves his fellow minister for standing at the Te Deum, and the times appointed for standing; will not endure to see the Surplice in the Church, but asks what it doth there? is so indifferent that he cares not if the communion table stand in the belfry; and upon a report that the Bishops were voted down in the Lords House, and that the Church was to be governed by nine laymen in every diocese, he said he was very glad of it, for now the Church would be better governed than ever it was! For God's love, Sir, ask if this be not a fit man to be supplied with Church livings and to take care of souls? whither shall it be imagined he will turn next? God deliver all Christians from such blind guides, and give you the patience not to be offended with me for being thus tedious.

An entire volume of the State Papers calendared in this volume consists of papers relating to Archbishop Laud, many of which seem to have been used in preparing his defence. Mr. Hamilton has accordingly been at the pains of arranging them as closely as possible in the order of the Articles of Impeachment to which they severally refer, and has thereby rendered a great service to inquirers. Some are endorsed by Laud, and a few notes in answer to articles are in his own hand.

For notices of general literary interest it would be futile to look among these documents of a time of civil and ecclesiastical troubles, and of the actual outbreak of domestic war. The last we hear of Sir John Suckling is the mention, in a letter from Paris dated August 1641, of a motion in the House of Commons for the stopping of the unlucky poet's pension; if the date (May 7) usually given for his death be correct, this might have been spared. We observe, by the way, that Mr. Hamilton in his preface repeats Forster's assumption (Arrest of the Five Members, p. 87, note) that the John Marston who from the Gate-house prison warned Lord Kimbolton of the intended arrest, was the celebrated dramatist, supposed to have died in 1634; but wherein, except handwriting, lay Mr. Forster's proof? In the summaries of newspapers we find, under the date 27th September to 4th October, 1643, a mention of "the Players' misfortune at the Fortune in Golding Lane, their players' clothes being seized upon in the time of play by authority from the Parliament," proving how the fatal Ordinance of September 20, 1642, had not met with implicit obedience. But, for the time, the prospects of literature and art were the reverse of bright under a régime whose supporters were encouraged in their fanaticism by such veracious insinuations as the following, offered by their favourite journal, the Mercurius Britannicus aforesaid:—

I am persuaded in time they [the Royalists] will go near to put down all preaching and praying, and have some religious masque or play instead of morning and evening prayer; it has been an old fashion at Court, amongst the Protestants there, to shut up the Sabbath with some wholesome piece of Ben Jonson or Davenant, a kind of comical divinity. Aulicus, fie! are you not ashamed so many bishops and so many prelates at Oxford, and bring forth no better reformation?

KNICKERBOCKER NUGGETS.*

NOT a few pretty and cheap series of classics have been started of late years, as well as some that are not at all pretty, and not even cheap at their ugliness. But it has been reserved for America to produce quite the prettiest, except for the horrible and barbarous American spelling. With that considerable exception, these "Knickerbocker Nuggets," a silly name enough, are almost everything that can be wished. In size, in type, and in their neat cloth binding, they resemble some of the "Diamond Classics" which used to be produced in England at the end of the last and the beginning of the present century more than anything else, and the print, though not large, is so clear and well spaced as not to be trying even to weak eyes. There are, indeed, some misprints; a certain quotation from Menander at the beginning of Headlong Hall is not merely guiltless of accents, but appears in the absolutely untranslatable form of [illegible] [sic] verse, while there is a mysterious thing called "A Newham Party" in the other book, which we could, but shall not, interpret. This, however, is a far lesser matter than such senseless solecisms as "armor," which ought to mean Brittany, and is intended to mean breastplates and helmets, and "traveler," which ought to mean Heaven knows what, and does mean traveller. However, it is no slight credit to the great American nation, even if it cannot spell (perhaps because it is too young), to have produced these delightfully pocketable editions, which from the list seem to be likely to extend to other work not less delightful. Let us hope, though they are not promised, that all the companions of Headlong Hall and Nightmare Abbey will be given in the same form.

The first volume of the series, however, is not Peacock, but the Gesta, and here we shall take the liberty of very heartily cursing the unreverend memory (we suppose he is dead) of the Reverend C. Swan. We do not know who he was or when he lived, and we do not wish to; but he seems to have meddled with the Gesta some time previous to 1845, when his version of them was first published in America. Than the Gesta Romanorum itself few more delightful books have ever issued from the wit of a combination of unknown persons and the lucky labour of one. Even the selections here made from the tales are altogether charming. Here is the beautiful legend of Jovinian the "proud Emperor," so admirably rendered by Mr. Morris, who, as all lovers of the Gesta found to their delight twenty years ago at the appearance of The Earthly Paradise, drew much from the delightful book, of which, according to the latest criticism, England may probably claim, if not the authorship exactly, at any rate the original redaction. Here are the Three Caskets and the Angel and the Hermit and the dread image with its percute hic! and the demon of the Gog-magogs, who furnished one of the most striking episodes in Marmion, and divers others. For these things, though he might sometimes have chosen better, we thank the defunct and Reverend Swan. But for what he chose to add of his own may the Muses for ever and ever refuse him any rite of swanupping or hopping as a bird of theirs. He has set these charming tales in a framework of conversation between three Oxford undergraduates, who speak as we hope, trust, and believe no Oxford graduates or undergraduates ever did before or since. It is not merely that the learning of the reverend bird as to the Gesta itself is altogether behind the times—it is not his fault that he lived before or our merit that we live after Oesterley. Nor is it merely that his general acquaintance with literature and literary history would, even at his own date, have borne improvement with great ease and advantage. It is his loading a charming book with such stuff as this. Thompson, Lathom, and Herbert are not only prigs, they do not only deal in vérités de M. de la Palisse and explanations of the obvious in the most exasperating fashion, but they quote tags of Latin in a way which would have justified any man of their day in sconcing each of them every time he opened his gaby mouth. "Setting aside the darkness," says Thompson, "as the result of accident or the invention of the chroniclers, a little clever mechanism will explain the movable bridge of Gerbert." "The discovery of the sword by Sir Guido," says Herbert, "reminds me of the magic swords so common among the Scandinavian heroes." In each of those cases a guinea fine or an imposition might have been sufficient penalty. But Lathom, who is the chief speaker, is the worst; and nothing short of sending down would have been enough for him. When we add that the Rev. Mr. Swan puts about as much of this rubbish as of the pure Gesta into his book, it is almost unnecessary to say further that this pretty little volume needs a constant and unflinching skipper.

There is no need of skipping, thank goodness! in the companion volume. We do not know that it was wise in the editor, whoever he is, to prefix nothing more about Peacock than a couple of pages of eulogy from an old Edinburgh Review, well enough justified in all conscience, but rhetorical and oracular, not to say vague, to Headlong Hall and Nightmare Abbey. Peacock, no doubt, ought to be very well known in this country; but it would be too much to say that he is, and we have already seen the remark of one poor creature—to be pitied, no doubt, but still partly excused—who said that the Edinburgh Reviewer seemed to have an extraordinarily high opinion of Mr. Peacock, but that he (the poor creature) was unable to discern anything in this volume which exactly justified it. The truth being, of course, that the Reviewer was chiefly thinking of Crotchet Castle, Maid Marian, the Misfortunes of Elphin and Melincourt, and that much of his criticism and his praise had so very particular bearing on at least Headlong Hall. Indeed it has been suggested, perhaps not wholly without reason, that the mere modern had better begin the study of Peacock in reverse order, so as to appreciate the Peacockian spirit at first as it is applied to matter familiar to him, as in Gryll Grange, and not to matter as unfamiliar almost as the style. Yet from another point of view it may justly be said that Peacock is for the Peacockian, and that to other than Peacockians shall he never be fully manifested. Is there not the excellent Mrs. Oliphant, a lady of no small literary stature, having a list of novels like that of Don Juan's victims to show, who not only confesses that she loves not Peacock, but hints that all of us who do love him are humbugs? On which point let Ausonius speak:—

Deformem quidam te dicunt, Crispa; at ego istud
Nescio: mi pulchra es; judice me satis est.

And how fair Peacock is to those whom a kind Providence has supplied with the necessary faculties for enjoying him it is surely unnecessary to say. It might have seemed impossible to add a new delight to Nightmare Abbey, but Professor Dowden and the other chatterers about Shelley have done it. Headlong Hall, like Crotchet Castle, though the earlier sketch has a somewhat less polished wit and less quintessence of [illegible] observation than the latter, is still immortal. Take speeches for skulls, and Socialism or undogmatic Christianity for perfectibilism, and a few other mutata for a few other mutanda (including, alas! cigarettes and coffee for Burgundy), and the rest remains as true, now that the Traeth Mawr has been for a great many years and by no means to any one's very great profit embanked, as when it was in process of embanking. Even the more personal and extravaganzish satire of the Abbey has nearly as much application as when Shelley and Byron and Coleridge sat for their portraits. And this interest of matter is the least part of the interest. The charming mocking or jovial verse, the polished allusive prose, the play over all of wit and humour both, Peacock's union of which is among the rarest things in literature, would suffice of themselves. If they are found in the other works even better than in Headlong Hall (they are nowhere found better than in Nightmare Abbey), they are found in Headlong Hall excellently well; and no such convenient edition of any one of the series is to be found as this of two.

The third volume of the collection makes a pretty, and in the strict sense an odd, trio. Who the editor who prefaces and arranges it may be we do not know, but some upper Power seems to have sent him a "gude conceit of himsel'," seeing that in a note to the translated essay by Sainte-Beuve, which serves as introduction, he observes:—"In this essay by the late M. Sainte-Beuve nothing has been altered, although in one or two places even his critical acuteness seems to have missed the point." That the idea of "altering" a critical essay because it seems faulty to somebody else should have even occurred to any one as possible is sufficiently astounding. He has also inserted one or two bracketed things in this text which testify to an equally mild and heartfelt self-confidence, and his divisions, subject-headings, and so forth, are a nuisance and an intrusion. Nevertheless a pretty pocket edition, even a garbled one, of this singular and charming book is welcome, and comes with curious interest alongside of the quaint romanticism of the Gesta and the humour of Peacock. Plenty of humour Chesterfield himself had; and if in romance he can hardly be said to have been very plentifully endowed, it was only because he was so thoroughly of his time. There are things in his other work, if not in the Letters themselves, which show that he had, so to speak, chambers in his mind which he never cared to unlock. The worse side of the eighteenth century, of which this very neglect of all things but what itself considered fashionable is a symptom, appears in Chesterfield often enough. He is constantly dogmatic where he ought to be amiably sceptical; and sceptical, amiably or not, when he ought to be dogmatic. But the admirable sense, the soundness of the general principles that underlie his apparently arbitrary and trivial dicta, the wit, the mastery of life as it presented itself to him, are things that never can be too highly praised. It is a great pity that the Letters have gone so much out of fashion; for, in some respects, they are especially suited as correctives to the habits of the present day; to our unmannerliness, our sentimentality, our gush, our cant. The editor does not ill (though, of course, it has often been done before him) to protest against the wrong estimate of Chesterfield's ethics which the personal pique of Johnson and the blundering goodiness of other persons who had not Johnson's excuse once made fashionable, and which has by no means yet been thoroughly or finally displaced by a sounder. But Chesterfield more than most writers must be read to be appreciated, and if some read him as a "nugget" they will not find him false gold.

POPULAR MISCONCEPTIONS.*

DR. HUNTINGFORD is no doubt right in thinking that popular misconceptions are a more formidable obstacle to the reception of the Bible than scientific conclusions from observed phenomena. They are something worse even than that; they are not only a bar to the reception of revelation, but substitute falsehood for truth in those who are willing to receive it. In selecting the story of the Creation, the Fall, and the Deluge for his experiment in removing some of these mistaken ideas, the author has chosen wisely, for there is no part of Scripture which suffers so much from a merely literal interpretation, and no part which furnishes so many facile objections to the unbeliever. Nothing can be easier than even to make fun out of light being created before the sun, or of the creation of woman, or of the serpent tempting her, or of the Infinite and Absolute walking in a garden, and so on, and such arguments have made many a young infidel. The present writer was once asked by such a philosophic aspirant of fifteen "Who was Cain's wife?"—a difficulty which Dr. Huntingford easily disposes of. But the objections to the first and second chapter are to be met by a larger treatment; not by smoothing away difficulties, but by looking at the narrative from an opposite point of view. Here is a history, perhaps the oldest document in the world, which compared with any other early guesses at the origin of things is pure wisdom, embodying ideas not only consistent with, but essential to, the best civilisation and the highest form of Christianity. In a couple of pages it lays down the bases of pure religion in the unity of God; of social life in the indissoluble union of man and woman and the sanctity of marriage; of the moral law in the sense of sin which follows upon yielding to temptation, and in the supremacy of conscience which asserts itself when appetite is satiated and passion is subdued, when "the voice of the Lord God is heard in the cool of the day."

To claim a spiritual rendering of a spiritual book is the author's chief aim in writing, and his method is the simple one of asking what the text says, treatment to which the crux of the "universal" deluge and of the rainbow readily yields, and which softens down the lapse of Noah into a legitimate conviviality, which the occasion might seem to warrant. He discusses, however, other questions arising out of his subject, such as the curious consistency of the blessing on Japheth with the character and fortunes of the audax Iapeti genus, as well as the identity of name; and the inevitable subject of evolution. On this last point he is not quite outspoken; he is sometimes indifferent about it, and sometimes hostile. But the value of the book is that a divine of undoubted orthodoxy has at last performed an obvious duty to the Bible and to reasonable religion. We are grateful for it, and our gratitude would be increased if he would reduce it to half its size, cutting down his digressions, and avoiding repetitions, and would ask the Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge to issue it in a cheap form.

B. R.'S EUTERPE.*

THE second of the nine Books of Herodotus is by many judicious persons reckoned to be the best of them all. Regarded as a monograph on Egypt, it may be called both redundant and defective; but as a bit of narrative it stands supreme among the masterpieces of history. Professor Sayce's judgment of Herodotus is not supported by Mr. Lang, who records in his Preface a deferential but decided protest. He denies the Professor's authorities, he upsets his premisses, disputes his inferences, and laughs at his Greek. Because Herodotus was not a modern philologist or Egyptologist, Mr. Lang does not think that it follows that Herodotus was a liar, a boaster, and a thief. Into these and other questions which have been raised or revived by Professor Sayce we do not propose to enter. Herodotus can take care of his own good faith. The sceptic who becomes a student of Herodotus will very soon shed all his doubts; and (as Mr. Lang remarks) "we have all a right to read Herodotus," though it would be impertinent "to intrude on the special studies of a learned critic." In another part of his Preface Mr. Lang "enjoys a gentle wrangle" with a reviewer who appears to have been acting after the manner of his kind. He has been making Mr. Lang say "pretty nearly the reverse" of what he really did say. Before these lines are printed we may expect to see the reviewer's rejoinder. The dispute is not unfriendly, and its different stages will be eagerly followed by everybody who takes a proper interest in the difference between the elemental and the totemistic aspect of ancient religions. Without wishing to disparage the learning and philosophy of Mr. Lang's Preface, we are glad to hasten on to the text.

"B. R." is an unidentified writer who flourished circa 1584; that is to say, he lived before the art of translation had been killed by unseasonable scholarship. The modern versions of ancient authors have been spoiled because, with very few exceptions, they have been more or less successfully adapted to the requirements of classical students. They fail to be literature because they try to be cribs. That is not the object which "B. R." set before himself. His plan was to saturate himself with Herodotus, with the spirit as well as the matter, and then to tell the Greek story in his native language. He follows the main structure of the chapters and the order of narrative because those are matters which could not be mended, but in dealing with individual sentences he gives himself a very free hand. This is the merit of "B. R." that, better than "Beloe the proverbially flat," and "Rawlinson the respectable," he does represent the real Herodotus. The faults of "B. R." must not be overlooked. He makes his translation do commentator's work; he not only turns good Greek into easy English, but he gratuitously introduces his own views and explanations. His interpolations are long and frequent; but it is admitted that many of them are admirable for aptness as well as audacity. He is so fully alive to the quiet humour of Herodotus that he overdoes it in his version; in this respect and in one other—the occasional slanginess of his language—he departs from the manner of Herodotus. It is not difficult to forgive an error which proceeds from excess of zeal, and which gives fresh life to the sweet old stories of Herodotus. We will slightly condense "B. R.'s" account of the interview between Alexander, "the yong gallaunt of Troy," and Protheus, King of Egypt:—

King. Yong gentleman, what are you, and from what countrey are you landed heere in Ægypt.

Alexander, who was not to seeke of an aunswere, with a comely grace, made aunswere to the King . . . .

And where, then (quoth the King), had you this goodly gentlewoman, for she seemeth to be a woman of no common bloud?

Whereat my youth somewhat mammering, before he could cast the plot of his excuse, was betrayed by his servaunts. . . .

The vassals having ended their speeche, Protheus turned himself to Alexander, and tucked him up with thys rounde tale: my friende (sayde he), were it not for the reverence I owe to straungers, with whome my custom is not to deale by rigour, I woulde surely pipe yee such a daunce for the wicked villanie wherewith thou hast abused thine hoast in Greece, that all unthankful wretches shoulde take example by thee how to use those that show them courtesie in a forraigne land.

Herodotus, it should be remembered, does not say anything about Paris being quick with excuses, or about Helen's noble appearance. "Mammering in his speech" is partly justified by πλανώμενος ἐν τῷ λόγῳ; but ἐγὼ ἄν σε ὑπὲρ τοῦ Ἕλληνος ἐτισάμην is the Greek which stands for "I woulde surely pipe yee such a daunce," &c., and λόγον τόνδε ἐκφαίνει ὁ Πρωτεὺς for "Protheus tucked him up with thys rounde tale." It must not be supposed that "B. R.'s" liberties with the text are always taken on this grand scale; very often he follows it pretty closely, but when he gets to one of Herodotus's good stories he likes to spread himself; another notable instance of "B. R.'s" expansion is seen in the story of "the cunning theefe" who made his way (with his unfortunate brother) into "the treasurie of King Rampsinitus." It will be remembered that "these subtile merchaunts according to theyr former wont approaching the spring head where they had dronke so oft before, one of them wente in, and groaping for the money was so fast entangled in a snare, that for hys lyfe hee wist not how to shifte." The other, to avoid unpleasant consequences, cut off his brother's head and carried it away with him. But the mother of these two brethren, "not able wyth patiente eyes to behold the wretched carkasse of her pitifull sonne," insisted upon the survivor recovering it from custody of the King's soldiers, and giving it a decent burial. So he pannelled certain asses, "which he loaded with bottells of sweete wyne," and when he came near to the King's guard "hee privily unstopped one or two of his bottells," and of course the wine flowed out from them freely, "whereat, fayning as though hee had beene besydes hymselfe, hee piteously cryed out, tearing hys hayre and stamping as one utterly ignoraunte whyche to remedye first." Naturally, the guards came to help him, and as naturally, "lyke a good fellow, he bestowed amongst them a bottle of wyne." This sort of thing went on for some time, and presently "it set my keepers in such a tantarra that beeyng well wetted they set more by three drammes of sleepe than syxe ounces of witte" (κρατηθέντας ὑπὸ τοῦ ὕπνου ἐνθάπερ ἔπινον κατακοιμηθῆναι). So the body was recovered and the King more than ever exasperated. Being a man of the world, he determined to work on the vanity which is seldom wanting in great criminals. The King's trap was ingenious and elaborate; but it cannot be recommended to the modern paterfamilias in a similar perplexity. Thanks to the zeal with which it was adopted by "the goodly gentlewoman his onely daughter, whom he tenderly loved from her childhood," it would have been completely successful if the culprit had not been as wary as he was audacious. He was induced by the Princess to confess "that the sinfullest acte that ever he committed was to cut off his brother's head, beeing inveigled in a snare in the King's treasurie, but the subtilest in that he had deceyved a sort of dronken asses whom the King had appoynted to watch the body." To provide against possible emergencies, before he ventured to make acquaintance with the King's daughter, he had provided himself with a spare hand which had once belonged to his deceased brother; and when the Lady tried to lay hold of him, he "subtilely presented her with the hande of his brother (which, being darke, she fast griped instead of his own), and hee conveyed himself from her and was no more seene." In the end he is very properly pardoned by the King and marries the King's daughter. "B. R." makes capital comments in the short notes printed at the side of each page—the treatment which was adopted for blindness in the case of King Pheco is called "an exquisite medicine"; the revenge which he wreaked on the ladies who had failed to satisfy the requirements of the case is described as "an army of honest women burnt at a clap." Another note which looks puzzling is "Hogs be the best husbands in Egypt, but the worst in England." This refers to the Egyptian custom of using swine, when the ground is "moyst and supple," to "roote and tread the grayne and moulds together." It is difficult for anybody who has not made a special study of the Elizabethan literature to distinguish the idiom from the slang of the period; but there can be little doubt that "B. R." has allowed himself in many passages to go beyond the limits of colloquial (not to say literary) license. Mr. Lang declares that this book is a treasury of old English slang. It is to be regretted that "B. R." fell into this mistake, because the style and language of Herodotus, easy and natural as they were, never for a moment descended even to the level of ordinary conversation. There is about him the unassuming but unassailable dignity which belongs to the gentlemen in literature, amongst whom we do not suppose that Mr. Stevenson will refuse to give him a place. A minor blemish in "B. R.'s" work is the reckless introduction of ideas and expressions which could not have been entertained or used by Herodotus. The names of Greek deities are boldly Latinized; an event is dated by the "kalends of July"; a fictitious story is said to be "as true as the man in the moon" (ταῦτα δὲ λέγουσι φλυαρέοντες). "When the souldyers of Egypt were abused and had in contempt" by "a certain priest called Sethon," to whom the royal power had passed, they took the opportunity to refuse their help, "after that Senacherib, King of the Arabians and Assyrians, had invaded Egypt with a mighty power." Hereupon "the priest was driven to a sudden blanke." "Not knowing how to shift, hee withdrewe himself into a close parlour, where complaying himselfe before his god, he shewed what great and imminent perils were like to befall him." While he was thus engaged "pouring out his teares and pitiful complaints before his image," he fell asleep, and was visited by a dream. "Maister parson" took heart of grace by this "blessed vision," and gathering together all the men whom he could persuade to follow him, "pedlers, tinkers, and common gadders that strayed here and there about the countrey," he took up his position "in Pelusia, on which side only Ægypt lieth open." In the night the camp of his enemies was invaded by "a huge multitude of field-mice, which gnawed their quivers, bit in sunder their bowstrings, and the braces off their shields, that in the morning, being disfurnished of their armour, they betooke themselves to flight, not without the losse of many souldiers." To commemorate this deliverance a statue of King Setho was set up "in the Temple of Vulcane," bearing the inscription "Learne by me to feare God." The scoffing tone of the earlier part of the narrative, notably the epithet "Maister Parson," is entirely due to "B. R.," not in any degree to Herodotus. This is one of the few cases in which the translator has badly misrepresented his author's mind as well as his language and style. Herodotus never sneers or jeers; though it is true that he is often enjoying a quiet laugh to himself, even when he professes to be most serious. Sometimes, again, "B. R." protests too much, certainly he goes beyond the warrant of his text. Speaking of the custom to sacrifice swine at the festivals of Selene and Dionysos, but for every other purpose to regard them as unclean beasts, Herodotus remarks that he knows the explanation which is current among the Egyptians, but he refuses to repeat it—ἐμοὶ μέντοι ἐπισταμένῳ [ὁ λόγος] οὐκ εὐπρεπέστερός ἐστι λέγεσθαι. This is rendered quaintly enough, but with superfluous energy—"Bycause mine eares glowed to heare it, I thought it maners to conceale it." Again "B. R." goes beyond the gentle and catholic spirit of Herodotus when he mentions certain religious observances as a sign that "superstition oft times runneth into most filthey devises." It is not necessary to quote or point out the best of the many good things which will be found in "B. R.'s" translation of Euterpe. To begin it is to read it to the end. The antique words and unusual turns of expression which are employed by "B. R." have the special, though accidental, merit of suggesting to a modern ear just that amount of difference which separated the Greek of Herodotus from the Greek of his Attic contemporaries. It would not be possible for anybody to give complete satisfaction by translating Herodotus into the current English of his own generation. Very likely "B. R.'s" excellent version did not seem to be (and really was not) so good when it was first produced as it has now become. But it is sound wine which is improved by keeping. Mr. Lang is right in saying that "'B. R.' tells a story with point, with breadth, and, above all, with enjoyment." He lived in an age of great translators; indeed, his life may have overlapped with Sir Thomas Urquhart's.

Mr. Lang's volume is daintily printed on rough paper, and executed in the antique style. The publishers announce that they have only five hundred copies to offer for sale. It is the reprint of "a sufficiently rare volume." Mr. Lang is himself fortunate enough to possess a copy which (he tells us) is taller and cleaner and altogether preferable to the one which passed from Mr. Payne Collier to Mr. Loftie.

THE ARCHITECT'S REGISTER.*

IT is somewhat difficult to say why the compilers of this little book chose this particular title for it, as it bears no particular relation to the contents. The compilation contains, however, some useful information and some interesting reading. The idea has been to make a small selection from amongst the hundreds of papers that are annually read before the various Architectural Societies of the world, and to place them in the hands of the interested public in a compact form. It is a little difficult to see on what principles the selection has been made; the result, however, is a good collection of papers on miscellaneous subjects. There are two well-written articles on theatre construction, a matter that will have to be seriously dealt with by whatever body takes the place of the Metropolitan Board of Works; and the somewhat anomalous position of the modern architect forms part of the subject of three others. Perhaps, however, the most interesting chapter of all is that by Mr. Thorp on the architecture of the last century. It is brightly written, and in these times it is very refreshing to find the refined merits of the school of Adam recognized, although in some cases the researches might have been deeper. Altogether we think that both the professional and the amateur will find instruction and pleasure from the perusal of the pages of this small collection.

TENTING ON THE PLAINS.†

IT is a pity that a writer like Mrs. Custer, who possesses a natural energy and descriptive art quite unusual, does not find a new topic or a new way of using her topic. Her recent book, Tenting on the Plains, is less interesting and a good deal longer than was Boots and Saddles, that vivid account of the life and death of a modern equestrian Boone. Tenting on the Plains would have been improved by "cutting," as most efforts of the human intellect would be. It is too long, and contains too many pages that provoke skipping. The figures of General Custer, of the black maid Eliza, and of the author herself are all well designed, and the kind of life is strange and interesting to read about, if it were only weeded of superfluous details. It is curious that Mrs. Custer, with her humour, her power of description, and her knowledge of unfamiliar scenes and modes of life, has not written a novel. There is always room for a new tale with the freshness which she should be able to give it, whereas the career of General Custer and his adventures are now tolerably well known.

Tenting on the Plains begins with a short biographical sketch of the General. The son of a poor, but humorous, father (some of whose feats of high spirits are narrated here), the General tried first to earn a living as a schoolmaster. He was fond of books, and his father denied himself comforts to please the boy's taste, while the exercises of the local militia gave him an early liking for the pomp of war. By teaching in a district school he made money enough to enter an academy for boys at Monroe in Michigan, though even here he supported himself "by working for his half-sister, with whom he lived." This was an instance of self-help, indeed; and his energy was rewarded by a nomination to West Point. Here he was known as a boy who liked a fight, either as principal or spectator. In later years, when he was a commander of cavalry, two of his officers had a quarrel about a young lady at a dance. He encouraged them to fight it out with fists (but without seconds) in a room which nobody was allowed to enter. It seems a queer method of settling a point of honour among cavalry officers, and would not recommend itself to European armies. When the war broke out "he reached the front just in time to run with all the rest" at the battle of Bull's Run. But this was the end of his running. His heart was in his profession. General McLellan noticed him and gave him promotion, and he served through all the battles of the army of the Potomac. "The men of his brigade adored him, and used to boast to their comrades in other commands, 'Our boy-general never says, "Go in, men!" HE says, with that whoop and yell of his, "Come on, boys!" and in we go, you bet.'" He was a general at twenty-three, and, being a boy, had a boy's relish for swagger in costume. His long yellow hair floated under a broad hat, over a navy-blue shirt, with a red necktie. "He was the strongest man at West Point but one," and he probably owed the preservation of his nerve to entire abstinence from liquor and tobacco. He was fond of animals and children, kind, charitable, and courageous, so that, despite his little theatrical airs, a man of great mark and merit died when General Custer fell into an Indian ambush at thirty-seven.

As soon as the war ended, General Custer was sent into Texas. The American Government was determined that, "if Mexico were to be gobbled up, the one to do the seizure and gather in the spoils was Brother Jonathan." The idea was that, if the French seriously menaced Mexico, Custer should head the advance of the States army. But he never had to cross swords with European cavalry, and the rest of his life was passed at frontier posts on the plains and in warfare with the Indians. It is of this life of primitive and cheery endurance that Mrs. Custer writes. The most amusing of her characters is certainly her black cook, the undefeated Eliza, whom the artist has drawn in the attempt to silence a Southern field battery by the mere terror of her frown. In later years Eliza was taken to see Buffalo Bill, and the buffaloes as well as Bill touchingly reminded her of the General. "Mr. Buffalo Bill when you come up to the stand and wheeled round I said to myself, 'Well, if he ain't the 'spress image of General Custer in battle, I never seed any one that was.'" So now most of us can guess what General Custer seemed like to the doomed foe —that is, an inspired Cowboy. His strength was so great that he exceeded the feat represented by the artist who decorated the rooms of Mr. Harry Foker, and he actually carried Mrs. Custer in one arm, lifting her out of the saddle while their horses were at full gallop! We do not remember that anything like this gallant act was performed by Buffalo Bill. What with crocodile-hunting in a boat, and fleeing the seed-tick, and the chigger, and suffering from break-bone fever, and riding till her face was "parboiled," and dodging tarantulas, and having her tent burned down, and warring with a jealous dog which was in love with the General, Mrs. Custer "had a"——well, not a paradise—"of a time" on the plains. A dog called Byron, who was a thief, and buried the spoils which he could not eat, added to her discomfort. More serious troubles began on the Indian frontier, where heat, desolation, and troops of an exquisitely cruel enemy surrounded the forts and made life hideous. People who feel inclined to skip Mrs. Custer's book had better study Chap. XXIII., where the fun and tragedy of border warfare are excellently given. The gallant humours of the negro warriors are capital; so is the siege of the omnibus, and the tale of the deserters in the oubliette. It is difficult to read Mrs. Custer's cheery story without sympathy, and the hope that she will essay her powers, in the old field, perhaps, but in a new style. The anecdote of Eliza, the drowning man, and the clothes-line (p. 641) might make the austerest critic pardon some superfluous pages. The trait of the lady "that never was known to keep any whisky before" is unrivalled, but the whole anecdote is too long to be extracted, and must be sought, with many other pleasant things, in Tenting on the Plains.

O'CONNELL.*

MR. J. A. HAMILTON tells the story of O'Connell's Life in about two hundred and twenty small and by no means closely printed pages; and he tells it simply and soberly. In a prefatory note he reviews his sources, but he does not seem to have drawn very copiously from them. The narrative is almost such as might have been compiled by a hasty bookmaker shortly after O'Connell's death to meet the demand of readers of railway-bookstall volumes. Mr. Hamilton is not a philosophical biographer of the order of Mr. Lecky, whose sketch of O'Connell in his Leaders of Public Opinion in Ireland is probably the truest estimate of him that has yet been framed; nor is he a picturesque biographer of the stamp of Mr. Carlyle, and he is creditably free from the affectation of appearing to be either. He does not even minutely survey the political controversies in which O'Connell was engaged, as Mr. Shaw-Lefevre has done in his work on Peel and O'Connell. But he has compiled a workmanlike chronological narrative, into which the intelligent reader may fit his own inferences and conclusions, or out of which, if he be imaginatively given, he may frame his own pictures.

O'Connell, it may seem a truism to say, occupies a unique position in modern Irish history. He is the first instance of a man of purely Celtic blood, and of the Roman Catholic faith, who has, within living memory, played a great part in the public affairs of his own country, and of the United Kingdom; and, after sixty years of equality and freedom between the two races and confessions, he has had no successor. The great Irish names are the names of men of English blood and of Protestant faith. The eloquence of the Irish Parliament was the eloquence of Hibernicized Englishmen, and the considerable capacity which it showed for legislation and government cannot be put down to the credit of the Celtic race. Its great names show the stock from which their bearers sprang; and, though there may have been occasional intermixture of blood, the English strain predominated, and all the influences which formed their character were English. The excesses of Irish Parliamentary rhetoric are dealt with somewhat severely by Mr. Goldwin Smith; but parallels could easily be found in the contemporary debates of the English Parliament for the most extravagant of the passages he cites; and it is noticeable that it was not the wildness, but the too formal, and almost pedantic, character of Flood's eloquence, and the measured slowness of his delivery, which were out of harmony with the freer debating habits of the British Parliament. Mr. Lecky points to the writings of Swift, Goldsmith, and Berkeley as models of purity and simplicity of style; and argues that the extravagance of Burke's later writings was due to the fact that long residence in England had made him indifferent to the restraints imposed by Irish canons of taste. Be this as it may, all the names which Mr. Lecky cites, and others which he might have added, as illustrations of the sobriety and refinement of Irish oratorical and literary genius, are the names of the English in Ireland. It could not have been otherwise. Until the beginning of the present century, and indeed for nearly a generation later, the English in Ireland were practically Ireland. A proscribed and untaught people had neither the means of cultivating nor the opportunity of displaying its native gifts. Nevertheless, the fact remains that the Irishmen who have best served England or given her most trouble, from Wellington and Wellesley to Lord Dufferin and Lord Wolseley, from Lord Edward Fitzgerald and Wolfe Tone to John Mitchel and Mr. Parnell, have been Irishmen of English blood. In politics there is only one great exception, that of O'Connell—Shiel is scarcely a case in point. In literature there is not, so far as we are aware, more than one—Tom Moore. The degree in which Irish Catholics, proscribed and insulted at home, were driven into service abroad offers in some degree an explanation of this fact. But the Irish emigration very imperfectly redresses the balance.

O'Connell remains the type of the native Irish politician—of the Catholic Celt. He showed what the genius of the race was capable of, though it seems for half a century to have exhausted itself in producing him. His oratory was simply the man speaking, such as he was or as he wished himself to appear. It was self-exposure—the nakedness of innocence sometimes, if of shamelessness at others. Blandishment, vituperation, humour, scorn, pathos, indignation seemed to come from him spontaneously. His pliant nature was equally at home in a court of justice, at an open-air meeting on the hill-side, and in the House of Commons. Mr. Lecky—whose opinion on this point, however, does not carry so much weight as it does on some others—holds that, with the exception of his great adversary, the late Lord Derby, he was the best debater of his time. Probably this remark requires a good deal of qualification; but, when allowance is made for the fact that he spoke to a hostile audience and in an environment antipathetic to his organization, his performances in the House of Commons are singular illustrations of his mental power and pliancy. Lord Beaconsfield states that in the management of his voice O'Connell had no superior or equal but the late Sir Robert Peel. It is curious to read that O'Connell made a special study of the oratorical methods of the younger Pitt, with whom he had not a single quality in common, except perhaps the art of elocution, in the narrow sense. The easy natural gesture, the mobile countenance, and the almost slovenly disregard of form which the Irish orator displayed were in every respect the antithesis of the stiff and mechanical movements, the fixed countenance, the majestic repose and self-possession, and the perfectly constructed sentences of the English statesman.

The judgment which the present generation is disposed to pass on O'Connell's political career is probably more indulgent, and in that sense fairer, than that which would have been pronounced even by observers endeavouring to be impartial forty years ago. The men who claim to be his successors act as his foils. O'Connell had seen the French Revolution close at hand; he had been personally in danger from it; he noted the attitude which it adopted to the Church, of which he was a devoted son. He pushed almost to an extreme his doctrine of non-resistance to lawful authority, and his hatred of violence, declaring that the largest public liberty was dearly purchased by the loss of a single life. He evaded the law, when he could, as an agitator, much in the spirit in which he would have pointed out a technical flaw in an indictment. But he never denied in words or practice that obedience was due to its terms. His aim, as Mr. Lecky has pointed out, was to restore self-respect to the Catholic people of Ireland, of which centuries of proscription had deprived them, and to make them count for something in the State. With this view he desired to bring the Roman Catholic priesthood into political action. It has been left to those who call themselves his successors to demoralize and deprave the Irish nation, and to drag the Irish Catholic clergy into complicity with violations of justice and charity which have brought down on them authoritative condemnation from Rome. O'Connell advocated Repeal; but he regarded that only as a means to an end, and declared himself over and over again willing to abandon it, if he could secure what he considered justice from the Imperial Parliament; and indeed more than once suspended his agitation, in order that the experiment of what could be got from English statesmen might be fairly tried. If O'Connell were living now, and were animated by the views which actuated him during his career, he would certainly be a Unionist. A demagogue by nature and by the necessities of his political task, he yet frequently endangered his position by adhering to unpopular principles. He alienated American support by his denunciation of slavery, opposed the Trades-Unionist outrages in Dublin at the risk of weakening his hold on the populace of the Irish capital, and was a Free-trader in spite of the Protectionist leanings of the Irish peasant. He did not show the alacrity which statesmen of higher moral pretensions have since shown to advocate anything or to make common cause with anybody for the sake of winning recruits. There is a debit side to O'Connell's account and a heavy one; but it is not necessary to dwell upon it here. In these days of Parnellism and the later-Gladstonianism, the career of O'Connell, wonderful as it may seem, lifts us to higher and purer regions of political morality.

NEW MUSIC.

WE have received from Messrs. E. Ascherberg & Co. several new compositions, of which "Rest to the Weary," a song with harmonium or organ obbligato by the late Signor Ciro Pinsuti, is about the best. It is described as the "last song" by this popular composer, who, judging from the following extract from a letter of his published on the cover, had no small opinion of its merits. "Here is," says he, addressing the publishers, "a grand, and I think a splendid, song, and I am quite sure, if properly introduced to the public, it will have a grand success." Would it not have been better to have kept this letter strictly private? for, although the song has merit, we confess we fail to see either its grandeur or its originality. It is very like the well-known "Chorister," and, although effective—most songs with a fairly good organ accompaniment are so—its claims are not of a high order. "Beyond the Stars," by F. Löhr, is also unsatisfactory, and much in the same style as the last mentioned. "John Anderson, my Jo" has been the original model of many a sentimental song, but scarcely ever of one so dreary as "The Auld Wife," "words by permission" from the Novel-reader, music by Leslie Trowbridge. It would seem that the life of the excellent old consort of John in this song has not been a particularly happy one, for "all her bairnies may be found in God's holy Book"—and she herself and her John "stand on the brink, John! O! the cauld cauld icy stream." The simplicity of the famous Scotch ballad had the merit of originality. Imitations of great things, great in their very modesty and absolute lack of affectation, are ever weak and foolish, and the "Auld Wife"—words and music—is no exception to the rule. "Dreams of the Past," by Romili, is pretty; the melody is graceful and the words fairly good. "Auntie's Rose," by Frederic N. Löhr, belongs to a class of songs we strongly object to. "Grandma," "Wife," and "Dying Sister" are [illegible] whom we fondly hoped were resting at last, and we fail to [illegible] we should be bothered with "Auntie." Nor do we particularly admire Signor Denza's tiresome "Kenneth and Marjorie," which is a kind of duet between two obnoxiously priggish children.

"The Brave [illegible]" is the name of a rather clever song by Mr. Edward S[illegible], published by W. Marshall & Co., who likewise send "[illegible]," by the same composer, an effective song with a taking [illegible]. "Gloria tibi Domine," by Mr. Joseph Barnby, is [illegible] and dull, and the "King of [illegible]," by Mr. Alfred Rawlings, is a well-written and effective religious song which Miss Hilda Wilson has made popular by her admirable singing.

Two clever little songs, "The Miser," by Ethel Harraden, and "Too Particular," by Douglas Reed, are published by Phillips & Page. They have the merit of possessing excellent and intelligible words.

The London Music Publishing Society has done well in issuing so delightful a duet as "Who is Sylvia?" for contralto and baritone; music by Mr. Erskine Allon. The melody is full of distinction, and the accompaniment excellent. "Bubbles," by Lady Borton, is a very weak composition; and "Toilers," a song by M. Piccolomini, is not much better. To be cordially recommended is "The Music Class," by Mr. Sinclair Dunn. It is excellent for classes in which singing at sight is taught.

The opening ode for the Manchester Exhibition, entitled "The New Covenant," by A. C. Mackenzie, is published by Messrs. Novello & Ewer. The words, by Mr. Robert Buchanan, are not very remarkable, but the music doubtless sounds imposing enough when performed by a full orchestra and chorus. However, when we state that it leads up to the "Old Hundredth," by way of a grand finale, nothing is left to be said; for, after all, as the elderly lady remarked of a like composition, "It is only variations of the dear old tune; you plays it slow and you plays it fast; loud or low, it is still the same familiar strain"—and the same may be said of nearly all the hymns recently composed for special occasions, which invariably terminate either in the aforesaid popular psalm or in "God save the Queen." Signor Tito Mattei's "Inno," for the opening of the Italian Exhibition, is a better work of its class, being a fair sample of the modern Italian, which tries so hard, with such poor results, to be Wagnerian. The words, by Signor Ghislanzoni, are bombastic, and altogether too pretentious. "The Italian Exhibition Waltz," by F. de Suppé, the composer of Boccaccio, is pretty; the first movement is rather heavy, but the second is very effective. These works are issued by Signor C. Ducci & Co.'s London Musical Bureau.

"'Neath Rosy Bower," by Lewis Honig, is a florid song, strongly suggesting Bishop's "Tell me, my heart," and certainly not equalling that very pretty and graceful bravura. "Love's Rebuke," by Henri Klein, is a dramatic and effective song. These are issued by Messrs. H. Klein & Co.

"The Valiant Knight" (Reid Brothers), with good words by W. C. Newsam, is a spirited ballad composed by Claude Melville.

Far above the average in style and charm are two songs by Mr. W. Fullerton, "That Summer's Day" and "The Love of Long Ago." The words are excellent and the music most graceful and well scored. Equally excellent in style and taste are "A Waking Dream," "For Me, Dear Love," and "When Shadows Lengthen," songs with admirable words, music by Mr. C. Paston Cooper, who has remarkable originality, and, what is more, that rare quality, distinction. These songs, which are published by Mr. B. Hollis, are among the very best we have heard in a long time, and deserve popularity.

An album of eight songs, by Arthur Fox (Ascherberg & Co.), contains some carefully written words, for soprano voice, which, if not very spontaneous and original, have the merit of being carefully scored and written. No. 3, a setting of Longfellow's "The Rainy Day," is strikingly graceful, and No. 7 and No. 8 are both original and essentially "taking."

Among the latest dance pieces there are none better than "Somebody's Sweetheart," by Popsie Rowe (Francis Bros. & Day), a lively waltz, in the style of Strauss.

A Bolero for the Pianoforte, by Sydney Shaw (Charles Woodhouse), is spirited, and the Spanish character of the dance is not neglected. The "Thistle Lancers," by Scott Leslie, is an exasperating *de*rangement of favourite Scotch ballad tunes for dancing purposes, which may please some people, but certainly not those who have any reverence (and who has not?) for the most delightful national airs in existence. A somewhat ponderous march, with a good cantabile movement, however, is "The Silver Wedding March," by Fabian Rose (Phillips & Page). "The Arrow," by the same composer, is a fairly graceful waltz.

COLCHESTER.*

ALMOST as much of this volume is taken up with the refutation of old legends as with the statement of facts. Mr. Cutts, of course, neither believes in the transmission of municipal institutions from Roman times nor in "Old King Cole" and his daughter the Empress St. Helena. Neither does he share the strange opinions put forward in a book lately noticed on The [illegible] as to Eudo Dapifer. Although he details the ancient history of Colchester at much greater length than the modern, it cannot be said that he is wrong; for Colchester is essentially a town with a past; a place where some very remarkable events occurred long ago, and where nothing ever seems to happen now, though Colchester natives are still, as Hood said, born to "vinegar and pepper." The annual dinner, the election of the mayor is called the Oyster Feast; but Mr. Cutts questions the meaning of the name, which he is inclined to derive, not from that of the bivalve, but from the law-French ostre. Be this as it may, Colchester is an interesting place, both on account of its historical associations, which rival those of York, and on account of its antiquarian remains, which are unrivalled elsewhere in England. Mr. Cutts has evidently suffered rather from an excess than from a dearth of material for his book. It is closely packed with facts, very little in the way of comment on their significance being admitted.

The remains of the Roman city of Colonia have hardly excited the wide interest to which they are entitled as by far the most perfect remains of the kind in England. As Mr. Cutts remarks, "the walls of Exeter, Lincoln, and (perhaps) Chester are erected on Roman foundations"; but at Colchester a large proportion of the existing wall is of the original Roman masonry. Nevertheless, as in London, "there are no traces to show where the principal places and public buildings—the forum, curia, temples, baths, theatres—were situated." Domestic appliances and personal ornaments have been found in plenty, and about five-and-thirty years ago the Corporation, assisted by the local archæologists, formed a museum, which is already one of the most important of the kind in England. The great cemetery, which extended outside the walls along the London road, has of late years been explored with care and skill, and the objects found are preserved in their relative positions in the museum. At Colchester, as at London, nothing is known of the circumstances attending the East-Saxon conquest. Both cities fell into the hands of the invaders, and Mr. Cutts is of opinion that Colchester did not long lie waste, "for when the Saxons came to colonize it, its Roman name had not been forgotten." The earliest Saxon houses, however, were probably not within the wall, and "it was only when the Saxons found themselves liable to the incursions of the Danes and Northmen that they began to value the security which the ancient walls afforded." Unlike London, Colchester is described in Domesday, and with great fulness and precision. It was reckoned as a hundred in itself, and is referred to, with its territorial district, as "civitas." This circumjacent territory Mr. Cutts supposes "to have formed the Oppidum" of Camulodunum, to have been appropriated as the ager of the Colonia, and to have been seized by the Saxon settlers, who formed the hundred of Colnecesster. There is a good deal of supposition here; but Mr. Cutts supports his views with the best of all possible reasoning—that, namely, derived from local topographical observation, which can be refuted only by some one who is still better acquainted with the place than himself. The list of the 276 burgesses in Domesday is very interesting, and Mr. Cutts analyses it carefully. We must, however, pass on to Eudo "Dapifer," who built the castle, and founded the great Abbey of St. John in the southern suburb. The Castle is singularly situated, not by the wall as in most places, not without the wall as in London, but in the heart of the town, as though we had the White Tower adjoining the Mansion House or the Bank. Mr. Cutts makes very slight allusion to the controversy which raged round the keep a few years ago. Some local antiquaries were enraged that its Roman origin should be doubted, and a war of words and pamphlets ensued. Built of Roman brick, it is the largest Norman keep in England, being some forty feet wider than the White Tower. There is reason to believe that Gundulf of Rochester was the architect of Colchester as well as of the White Tower, for he was a friend of Eudo, and the known dates fit well. Mr. Cutts's notes on the parochial history in his eleventh chapter are very interesting, as is the account of the Jewry in the thirteenth. An entry in the Forest Rolls in 1267 is quoted to show that the Jews and the Christians "had more freedom of social intercourse than is commonly supposed." But as the scribe who made the record sketched in the margin the figure of a Jew and labelled it, "Aaron, fil Diaboli," this intercourse would not seem to have been of a very cordial character. Like many other English towns, Colchester obtained its first charter from Richard I., or rather had a charter forced upon it, and had, no doubt, to pay handsomely for it. Charles I. gave the town a mayor. The chief guild was that of St. Helen; but Mr. Cutts does not mention any guild merchant. The siege and surrender in 1648, when Lord Fairfax had Lucas and Lisle put to death, damaged Colchester irreparably, and its later history is uninteresting. Let us note, in conclusion, that there is a curious discrepancy between some of the chapter-headings and the contents of the same chapters, and more is promised to the reader than is to be found in the book.

WILLIAM OF MALMESBURY'S GESTA REGUM.—VOL. I.*

HISTORICAL scholars have good reason to rejoice at every fresh proof that the Bishop of Chester's diocesan engagements will not deprive them of receiving from time to time some addition to the noble array of volumes he has already contributed to the Rolls series of Chronicles and Memorials. Whatever he does he does with a master's hand, and he has certainly done nothing that surpasses his work in these volumes. His prefaces on the subject-matter of his authors contain treatises of which it is a small thing to say that they show a depth of learning and a clearness of conception that, if he had never written another line, would entitle him to a high place among the greatest historians of the century; while his treatment of his texts is a marvellous exhibition of industry and skill. The Gesta Regum and Historia Novella of William of Malmesbury afford him a worthy field for the exercise of his talents, and it is fortunate that these masterpieces of our second native historian have not been assigned to any less competent editor. The present volume contains the first two books of the Gesta Regum, which carry the author's work down to the battle of Hastings. The Preface is mainly occupied by a classification and description of the various manuscripts used in forming the text and a discussion of the relationship in which they stand to one another. A critical examination of the author's sources of information and the use he made of them is reserved for another volume. Before entering on his account of the manuscripts of the Gesta Regum Bishop Stubbs says a few words on the place his author holds in the development of our historical literature and comments fully on the scanty materials that exist for his biography. William of Malmesbury looked on himself as the successor of Bede, and he was to some extent justified in the opinion he formed of his own work. From the Historia Ecclesiastica on to the Gesta Regum historical writers had been content to compile hagiographies and annals; he "aspired to the art of the historian." He arranges his facts with an eye to the causes and tendencies of events, gives much attention to the delineation of character, writes with a conscious and successful effort to be fair to all causes and persons, and displays great reading and "thoughtful research in many regions of learning." Bishop Stubbs points out that, as a "step in the working out of historiography," the Gesta has a "monumental value"; and, intimate as his previous acquaintance with it must of course have been, declares that the minute attention he has now given to it has enhanced his appreciation of the book and its author. He will not, we hope, think the worse of us for saying that, while we heartily agree with all he has written in praise of the Gesta, we nevertheless find William's style somewhat tedious; it is often inflated and sometimes obscure; his arrangement is confused, and his habit of interrupting the course of his narrative with long digressions unspeakably provoking.

Although William simply tells us that he was a man of mixed race, Bishop Stubbs shows that it is probable that his father was the Norman, and that he was a knight, merchant, or landowner of some wealth. The date of his birth must remain undecided, though it is fairly certain that it must not be put earlier than 1095, the year assigned to it by the late Mr. Sharpe. Still, though this conclusion rests on William's express declaration that he was forty after the death of Henry I., it involves some difficulties which are clearly stated, and as far as possible extenuated. If we accept 1095 as the earliest date at which William could have been born, it is clear that all he says concerning persons and events belonging to the first part of Henry's reign must have been derived from others. At the same time he had good opportunities of learning about bygone times, for he was brought up in the monastery at Malmesbury, and in his boyhood talked with monks who remembered the days of Canute. Most part of the Gesta Regum was certainly written before the Gesta Pontificum, which contains several references to it; but the two books seem to have been completed almost at the same date, both probably in 1125, and were perhaps carried on concurrently. Between the Gesta Regum and the Historia Novella is a gap which leaves the events of the later years of the reign of Henry I. virtually untold, and it is suggested, with great probability, that the "tres libelli," to which the author gave the name of "Chronicles," and which have been lost, consisted of bare notes of the events of this period, written in chronological order, that they were not intended as a "fulfilment of the promise to supply in another volume the events 'per succiduos semper annos,'" and that William did not think them "worthy to be incorporated with the book of which he was not unjustly proud." An interesting account is given of his legal, theological, and biographical studies, which are each referred to a distinct period of his life. His relations with the monks of Glastonbury, for whom he did so much valuable work, cannot be determined exactly. He speaks of himself when addressing them as "vester devotione servus, commilitio frater, dilectione filius," and declares that he was a professed monk of their house. We have hitherto been content to interpret these expressions as signifying that he had been admitted a member of the Glastonbury congregation honoris causa, or more exactly that he had been granted letters of confraternity in consideration of the services he rendered the abbey as an historian. While not rejecting this view, Bishop Stubbs ingeniously argues that it is quite possible that he may have found it necessary to take shelter at Glastonbury during the earlier troubles of Stephen's reign, and have been enrolled among the brethren there. The Gesta Regum contains very few notices of the affairs of Malmesbury Abbey during the author's youth. When, however, he relates how the revenues of the house had been seized by Bishop Ealhstan in the time of Æthelred I., he says that a like thing had happened in his own days. This refers to the treatment the abbey was then receiving from the famous Bishop Roger of Salisbury. When Roger died the house regained its independence; and William was, as we learn from a fragment quoted by Leland, and reprinted here, a candidate for the abbacy. His friend Peter was preferred, and William takes credit to himself for retiring in his favour. After his election Peter journeyed to Rome, and William compiled an account of the Abbot's travels, which Bishop Stubbs thinks may yet be discovered. In common with the late Sir Thomas Hardy, who edited the Gesta for the English Historical Society, Bishop Stubbs bases his text on the Margam MS. (Reg. 13, D. 2), the "representative manuscript of the third edition." With this he has compared no fewer than twenty-nine other manuscripts which he describes fully in his preface. One of them, the Tournay MS., in the library of Sir Thomas Phillipps, and a MS. in the National Library at Paris, the source of the excerpts printed by Jerome Commelin in 1587, contain a poem on the evils of the age, which is given here as "illustrative of the thoughts of our author's times." The first edition and the two later recensions of William's work are clearly distinguished, and each manuscript is classed according to the edition to which it belongs. It is, we are told, impossible to decide with anything like certainty which of the two later editions is the earlier in date. Both alike exhibit some highly interesting points of difference from the work in its original form. As the author grew older he grew more cautious or probably more moderate in feeling, and he accordingly modified in his later recensions many harsh expressions that are to be found in the MSS. of the first edition. Mr. Hamilton, the editor of the Gesta Pontificum, has already shown that William made alterations of the same character, though in far greater number, in the later recensions of that work, and this, as Bishop Stubbs remarks, confirms the inference that his revision of the Gesta Regum was the "result of sober and more mature judgment."

FRENCH LITERATURE.

THE periods and subjects in which M. Henry Houssaye (1) (we hope we shall be excused for saying that we always think of him as occupying towards his volatile papa something of the relation of the younger and the elder Mr. Turveydrop) has worked are numerous, and he has done good, if not extraordinarily distinguished, work in all of them. 1814 deserves the same commendation. The title is perhaps in strictness a very little too wide; for this military history of what may be called the agony of Napoleon only refers very briefly to the operations on the side of the Pyrenees. The Emperor's superhuman, but from the first hopeless, efforts to arrest the invasion on the eastern frontier and their failure occupy M. Houssaye for the most part. In dealing with them he shows all the care and the exhaustive attention to documents which marks the newer French school of historical inquirers, just as an airy contempt for such plodding used to mark the older school; and his investigations into orders of the day, correspondence, &c., have certainly not been fruitless. We think, however, that he has, on the whole, allowed himself to be somewhat blinded to the surely undeniable fact that this struggle, as of a beast at bay, however magnificent, was not war, and has therefore thrown on Augereau, Marmont, and others blame which is really due to their master. The whole campaign seems to have been very like one of those attempts to hold an untenable post which, according to the older and sterner laws of war, deserve, not praise, but condign punishment. And we think the story of the hiring of the Marquis de Maubreuil to murder Napoleon to be a story very much of a cock and of a bull. But the book is a painstaking and an intelligent book: and such are always welcome.

We cannot say quite so much of Prince George Bibesco's rather loftily named volume (2). The politics and the religion enter into minutiæ of Roumanian affairs, with which (we own it with, we trust, not insolent frankness) we happen to be but generally acquainted. The "duel" part, though more generally intelligible, is not very remarkable.

M. Henry Houssaye calls Lynch, the Royalist Mayor of Bordeaux, "un grand coquin," speaking therein rather partially. The Maréchal de Tessé (3) was not exactly a grand coquin, but it would require considerable charity to speak of him as an honnête homme. He was perhaps more unlucky than unskilful as a soldier, and it may not have been his fault that he was put upon such work as dragooning the Huguenots and ravaging the Palatinate. He did some fairly good diplomatic work for France. But he was a courtier and a time-server to the backbone—a typical example of the men who, in Louis XIV.'s latter days, brought their country to the brink of ruin without caring for anything, and to a great extent because they did not care for anything, but their own private profit and promotion. Yet, like most Frenchmen of the time, he was an agreeable writer, and as it was his habit to pay perpetual epistolary court to Ministers, Kings' mistresses, charming young princesses like the Duchesse de Bourgogne, and so forth, M. de Rambuteau has had no difficulty in making an interesting and readable volume out of his selected letters. It does not tell us much that is new as to public affairs, and it is only one more illustration, after a thousand others, of the rapid degradation of the French nobility; but it contains plenty of agreeable gossip, and may here and there furnish a hint or give a key to the historian.

M. de Lorgeril's (4) poems have three points about them which would dispense us from treating them severely, even if severity were otherwise required. They are very short; they are for the most part very good-humoured, and they are the work of a man of seventy-five. But they do not need to be judged with this allowance of weight for age, and the experiment of the first poem—the adaptation of ottava rima to French—is interesting. It would not be very easy offhand to say why the couplet-cuckoo has turned the eggs of so many other singing birds out of the French nest; but it is so.

The long romance of Dostoieffsky (5), which has been translated and "adapted" (whatever that may mean) by E. Halpérine, might serve as well as another for an introduction to the class of work. It has the same undisciplined and desultory fluency, the same incoherence and horror, as of a bad dream, the same flashes of talent, and the same (to some persons attractive) unfamiliarity of manners, sentiment, and setting which distinguish most of them when they are not simply dull. It has the advantage that one character (we regret to say that she is a kind of Improperia) is human and striking. She appears to be called "Grouschegnka" for love and for euphony, "Agrafeana Alexandrovna" when a brief but ceremonious appellation is desired. M. Duplan's first and title story (6) exhibits a curious point of honour in that odd code which has for its general principle the maxim somewhere formulated by M. Daudet. The second story—"Solange"—has a rather wider range. Sœur Sainte-Agnès (7) is a rather unequal book. At one point the author at least seems, in his delineation of a French country gentleman of the old school, to be about to make a great hit; but he is unable to follow it up. His villain is rather unintelligible, his hero repulsive, and his hero's wife a very great deal too good for him. But the story has promise.

NEW BOOKS AND REPRINTS.

JEWISH Portraits, by Lady Magnus (Fisher Unwin), is a reprint of magazine articles on Jews and Judaism, which better merit collection than most literature of their class. In the first place, they are commendable for matter and style. And they make, and are not made into, a book—as sometimes happens when papers reappear in book form. To read them as a whole is a distinct gain. The typical Jews represented by the portraiture of Lady Magnus are Jehudah Halevi, Manasseh Ben Israel—the eloquent author of the Vindiciæ Judæorum—Moses Mendelssohn, and Heine. Then we have a graphic sketch of the Frankfort Judengasse, a note on a Jewish criticism of Daniel Deronda, and a very suggestive and interesting paper on Jewish almsgiving according to the teaching of the Talmud. In all these thoughtful and lucid studies of Jewish character and society the twofold aspect of Judaism is presented in striking relief. There is the historical view, which comprehends the religious—as Lady Magnus justly observes—and there is the tribal sentiment of community which is so remarkable a characteristic of a people inexorably dispersed, yet in no sense disintegrated. In the portraits proper Lady Magnus shows such delicate insight and well-directed sympathy that we can only wish some extension of her gallery. Philosophy, poetry, theology, have their typical representatives, and music might well be included in another volume, if Lady Magnus intends, as we hope, to enlarge the scope of her studies. Her "Heinrich Heine; a Plea" is not less delightful to read than enlightened and opportune. Even at this time there are not a few readers of Heine who may be led to a sound estimate of the poet by this admirable sketch of his life and work. Lady Magnus has taken Carlyle's "That blackguard Heine" as the text for a discourse that is excellently persuasive and temperate. There is also good criticism in the short paper on Mr. J. W. Ferrier's translation of Professor Kaufmann's George Eliot and Judaism. Most novel-readers are not greatly enamoured of the hero in Daniel Deronda. He is somewhat bloodless and inaccessible, too much given to attitudinizing like "the high-priest of a tableau vivant," as the young lady says in Mr. Henry James's elegant dialogue. Putting aside the artistic aims of fiction, it is of course interesting to know what the Jews themselves think of a book "of which Judaism is the acknowledged theme"; and here, as elsewhere, Lady Magnus writes with good sense and discrimination. Altogether, Jewish Portraits is very pleasant and profitable reading.

Mr. Henry Alexander Glass, in The Story of the Psalters (Kegan Paul, Trench, & Co.), has successfully discharged a curious undertaking. He has compiled a history of the metrical versions of the Psalms published in Great Britain and America between 1549 and 1885. Those who are familiar only with Sternhold or Tate and Brady may possibly be amazed to find that these versifiers are completely outdone in daring and almost elevated to poetic rank when contrasted with some fifty of their less known competitors. It is instructive and diverting to observe the ingenious efforts of each successive versifier to amend the work of his predecessors, and this may easily be done, as Mr. Glass arranges his specimens in chronological order, and these in each instance are the opening stanzas of the 1st and 23rd Psalms. Of course paraphrases by poets, like those of Sidney, George Wither, and one or two more, are like green spots in the waste; but the survey, on the whole, is appalling. It was the purchase for one penny of a fine copy of Tate and Brady, dated 1771, which impelled Mr. Glass to deal with the subject. We must congratulate him both on his good fortune and the interesting book he has produced.

Dr. Busteed's valuable and entertaining Echoes of Old Calcutta (Thacker & Co.) has arrived at a second edition, revised, enlarged, and illustrated with portraits and other plates, rare or quaint. It is a pleasure to reiterate the warm commendation of this instructive and lively volume which its appearance called forth some few years since. It would be lamentable if a book so fraught with interest to all Englishmen should be restricted to Anglo-Indian circles. The capital historical paper on the events that culminated in the Black Hole tragedy is further strengthened by the illustrations of Fort William by Mr. S. de Wilde, which give the author's conjectural restoration of portions of the building long since disappeared. A fresh instalment of letters from Warren Hastings to his wife must be noted as extremely interesting, while the papers on Sir Philip Francis, Nuncomar, and the romantic career of Mrs. Grand, who became Princess Benevento and the wife of Talleyrand, ought by now to be widely known.

Messrs. T. and A. Constable have issued in elegant form an excellent descriptive catalogue to the archæological collection at the Glasgow Exhibition, entitled The Book of the Bishop's Castle. It is prefaced by an etching of the old castle long the residence of the Bishops or Archbishops of Glasgow, and by a brief historical sketch of the building.

Motteux's translation of the three last books of Rabelais—The Sequel to Pantagruel (Routledge)—forms the penultimate volume of Professor Henry Morley's "Universal Library." A final volume, comprising title-pages responding to a projected re-issue, is announced, and, under the title the "Carisbrooke Library," the series is to be carried on in the autumn in larger volumes of improved type.

Mrs. Carey Brock's Church Echoes (Seeley & Co.) is a story of a didactic cast, illustrative of the sacramental and special services of the Prayer-book. Its scheme is too arbitrary, perhaps, to be vitally set forth in the guise of fiction. There is excellent moral teaching, without doubt, in the book, but the story is loosely constructed and too episodical.

A new illustrated edition of Stepping Heavenward, by Mrs. Elizabeth Prentiss (Hodder & Stoughton), ought to appeal to many readers. The opening portion of this story—the diary of the young heroine—is delightfully natural. Indeed, on the whole, this American story for girls merits the popularity it enjoys.

The Shadow of a Life, by J. Laurence Hornibrook (Swan Sonnenschein & Co.), is a sensational story of the good old type. It abounds in fearless inconsequences. Its wicked nobleman is of the right kind. He wallows in crime from the moment of his appearance until he is circumvented by a marvellous detective. The author, by the way, is evidently under the impression that French officers who shared in a reconnaissance during the last war were liable, if captured by the Germans, to the shameful doom of the spy.

"Routledge's Pocket Library" is enriched by the exhilarating addition of Rejected Addresses, which, like the rest of the series, appears in comely form and beautiful type. Perhaps a cheap and popular edition ought to give the names of the authors on the title-page and some indication of their respective shares in these incomparable parodies. A reference to "Mr. Cruikshank," again, can hardly be clear to every reader of an edition that does not include the illustrations by that artist.

Mr. Robert H. Jones is the author of a very readable pamphlet—Asbestos: its Production and Use (Crosby Lockwood & Son.)—on the principal asbestos mines of Canada, and the vast increase in the commercial value and industrial application of the mineral during the last ten years.

We have received a new edition of Mr. Leslie Stephen's Pope, "English Men of Letters" series (Macmillan & Co.); the Official Year-Book of the Scientific and Learned Societies of Great Britain and Ireland (Griffin & Co.); Barker's Trade and Finance Manual, an excellent statistical handbook, with a large and legible world map, showing trade routes to various ports, &c. (Effingham Wilson); A Concise History of Australian Settlement, reprinted from the Sydney Morning Herald (Sydney: Fairfax); the current issue of the Bookworm (Elliot Stock), and the seventeenth volume of Mrs. Horace Dobell's In the Watches of the Night (Remington). We have also received some samples of Badminton Bath Post note-paper and envelopes of a bluish tint and agreeable texture from Rock Brothers.

NORTHERN ASSURANCE COMPANY.

ESTABLISHED 1836.

ABERDEEN—1 UNION TERRACE. LONDON—1 MOORGATE STREET.

Accumulated Funds, £3,421,000.

The FIFTY-SECOND ANNUAL GENERAL MEETING of this Company was held within their house at Aberdeen on Friday, June 8, 1888, when the Directors' Report was presented.

The following is a summary of the Report referred to:—

FIRE DEPARTMENT.

The PREMIUMS received last year amounted to £606,918 3s. 5d., showing an increase of £21,950 7s. 2d. over those of the previous year.

The LOSSES amounted to £347,051 16s. 9d., or 57·18 per cent. of the premiums.

The EXPENSES of MANAGEMENT (including commission to agents and charges of every kind) came to £204,306 2s. 4d., or 33·66 per cent. of the premiums. After reserving the usual 33 per cent. of the premiums to cover liabilities under current policies, a profit was earned of £17,210 8s. 8d.

LIFE DEPARTMENT.

ASSURANCE BRANCHES.—The new assurances during the year reached in the aggregate the sum of £368,285. These new assurances yielded annual premiums amounting to £12,677 1s. 10d., and single premiums amounting to £185 2s. 10d.

The TOTAL INCOME of the year (including interest) was £277,009 18s. 10d.

The CLAIMS amounted to £164,599 18s. 8d.

The EXPENSES of MANAGEMENT (including commission) were limited to 10 per cent. of the premiums received.

ANNUITY BRANCH.—The sum of £10,703 0s. 5d. was received for annuities granted during the year

The whole FUNDS of the Life Department now amount to £2,103,125 10s. 10d.

The Report having been unanimously adopted, it was resolved that the total amount to be distributed amongst the Shareholders for the year 1887 be £75,000, being a Dividend of £2 and Bonuses of 10s. per share, and that the sum of £50,000 be added to the Fire Reserve Fund, making that Fund now stand at £725,000.

FLEAS IN DOGS.

DR. GORDON STABLES, in his well-known work "Our Friend the Dog," writes:—

"There is no one, save the poor animal himself, knows the misery and wretchedness that fleas cause to a dog. It is not too much to say that they cost thousands of valuable animals their lives, for not only is sleep thereby banished and nervous ailments induced, but the constant scratching spoils the coat and brings on skin disease. Naldire's Dog Soap destroys these pests, and changes many a miserable cur into a well-feathered, sleek, and happy dog."—GORDON STABLES, M.D., R.N.

SYLVIA ARDEN.

1 vol. crown 8vo. 6s.

From the ACADEMY.

We do not think Mr. Oswald Crawfurd has ever done anything so good of its kind as "Sylvia Arden." It is full of hairbreadth 'scapes from imminent deadly Greeks and others, pilots the hero through them with speed and skill, and comes to a satisfactory and striking end."

From the WORLD.

"Is Saul also among the prophets?" Is Mr. Oswald Crawfurd to be numbered among the sensational novelists? It would certainly seem so, judging from his latest production, "Sylvia Arden," and in common fairness we must congratulate him on the success of his first venture in the new style. Written, of course, with much more grace and delicacy than the ordinary "shilling shocker," Mr. Crawfurd's story is full of interest and excitement, and fulfils its raison d'être by holding the breathless atten on of the reader from first to last.

From the SCOTSMAN.

Mr. Oswald Crawfurd's new story, "Sylvia Arden," is a weird and powerful romance of the imagination. It is so cleverly constructed as to sustain at an even level a strong interest roused almost from the beginning. Part of this effect is due, it may be, less to the story in itself than to the steadily maintained interest of Mr. Crawfurd's narrative style—good, nervous prose, instinct with simplicity and strength.

OXFORD ENGLISH DICTIONARY.

COMPLETION OF THE FIRST VOLUME—A-B.

Just published, royal 4to. half-morocco, £2 12s. 6d. Vol. I., A—B (may also be had handsomely bound in whole russia). Part IV. BRA—CASS, 4to. paper covers, 12s. 6d.; or separately, Section I., BRA—BYZ, 7s. 6d.; Section II., C—CASS, 5s.

A NEW ENGLISH DICTIONARY

ON HISTORICAL PRINCIPLES,

Edited by JAMES A. H. MURRAY,

B.A. Lond., Hon. M.A. Oxon., LL.D. Edin., D.C.L. Dunelm., &c.; sometime President of the Philological Society,

With the assistance of many Scholars and Men of Science.

THE OXFORD ENGLISH DICTIONARY aims at furnishing an adequate account of the meaning, origin, and history of English words now in general use, or known to have been in use at any time during the last 700 years. It endeavours:—

(1) To show with regard to each individual word when, how, in what shape, and with what signification it became English; what development of form and meaning it has since received; which of its uses have become obsolete and which survive; what new uses have since arisen, by what processes, and when:

(2) To illustrate these facts by a series of quotations ranging from the first known occurrence of the word to the latest, or down to the present day; the word being thus made to exhibit its own history and meaning; and (3) to treat the etymology of each word strictly on the basis of historical fact and in accordance with the methods and results of modern philological science.

THE OXFORD ENGLISH DICTIONARY embraces a vocabulary which will be found to be, even in its modern words, much more extensive than that of any existing dictionary. Subject to the conditions which encompass every attempt to construct a complete English Dictionary, the OXFORD ENGLISH DICTIONARY aims at exhibiting the history and signification of the English words now in use or known to have been in use since the middle of the twelfth century, which has been adopted as the only natural halting place between English and Anglo-Saxon. Within these chronological limits it is the aim of the Dictionary to deal with all the common words of speech and literature, and with all words which approach these in character. In scientific and technical terminology, all words English in form are included (except those of which an explanation would be unintelligible except to the specialist), and such words not English in form as either are in general use, as focus, bronchitis, or belong to the familiar language of science, as mammalia, invertebrata. Dialectal words and forms since 1500 are only included when they continue the history of a word or sense, or have in themselves a certain literary currency.

THE OXFORD ENGLISH DICTIONARY in the present volume contains the words beginning with the letters A and B, containing 31,254 words, not reckoning the simple combinations of obvious meaning, such as air-current, air-passage, which are practically unlimited. If these were reckoned the number would exceed 40,000. The 31,254 words are thus distributed:—

Main Words.		Special Combinations.	Subordinate Words.	Total.
B	10,049	3,180	2,902	16,131
In Vol. ..	22,232	4,292	4,730	31,254

The Main Words may be distributed thus:—

Current.		Obsolete.	Alien.	Total.
A	8,184	3,449	550	12,183
B	7,196	2,533	320	10,049
In Vol. ..	15,380	5,982	870	22,232

The main words are, it will be seen, less numerous in B than in A, and in most dictionaries B occupies less space than A. In the OXFORD ENGLISH DICTIONARY, however, A fills 603, B 637 pages. The difference is due to the diversity of the historical character of the words, and the effect which this diversity has in a dictionary which employs the historical method in treating them. A has a very small proportion of native English or Teutonic words and a very large proportion of words from Latin and from Greek. B has a much smaller number of words from these sources and a very large proportion of native Teutonic words. Words such as these which have been in the language from the beginning, with their long history, great variety of form, and many ramifications of meaning, and many compounds necessarily require more space than words which came into the language only in the 15th, 16th, or 17th century, and have since received but little development of meaning or change of form. Hence the average length of the articles in B is greater than those in A, and the space occupied by B is greater than that occupied by A.

Moreover, while A contains but few words of doubtful derivation, the words in B are full of etymological problems. Every one of these has here received a fresh and independent investigation in the light of the latest philological knowledge, and with the assistance of the ablest living philologists, and the result has been the discovery of new facts or the elimination of old errors in regard to many words.

SOME EXTRACTS FROM REVIEWS:—

"This monumental work........Never before has the English language been treated lexicographically in a manner so truly comprehensive and scientific, and rarely has the University of Oxford lent the resources of its celebrated press to a work more worthy of its ancient renown." TIMES, March 12, 1886.

"It is impossible to illustrate the manifold excellences of the two parts before us within our limits, as some of the best articles are longer than a review of average length, and it would be both difficult and invidious to single out a few for special commendation from the hundreds of words to which Dr. Murray has drawn attention as presenting points of special interest. In the case of so vast and so excellent a work a few candid criticisms suggesting a slightly closer approach to ideal perfection are.... more of a compliment than any amount of vague and easy eulogy."—ATHENÆUM.

"As for criticism, in the ordinary sense, there can be no question of it. The Dictionary will itself be the greatest monument of English philological criticism ever constructed." SATURDAY REVIEW.

"........That there is a sphere for literary excellence even in lexicography Dr. Murray has demonstrated abundantly, and within the unquestionable limits of his field. It is not merely that he is neat and orderly and lucid in statement, that he has a command of fit and happy language, that he is copious without prolixity; these are great merits, but there is sometimes, when the subject admits, a depth of historical perspective which gives richness to the treatment and elevates the pursuit of etymology above its ordinary level."—GUARDIAN.

MARZIO'S CRUCIFIX. By F. MARION CRAWFORD, Author of "Mr. Isaacs," "Dr. Claudius."

The Guardian says:—"Like all Mr. Crawford's novels, 'Marzio's Crucifix' is full of good things well said, sound observations on life and character, so lightly and gracefully turned that one does not immediately realise what homely well-worn truths they embody."

THE NEW ANTIGONE: Romance.

The Times says:—"A daring outline and fine workmanship give this novel a claim to more than ordinary attention......Few more dramatic situations could be conceived, and it is unnecessary to peruse the story further to illustrate the genuine power and originality of the author. We have spoken of fine workmanship; and 'The New Antigone' is full of evidence that we stand in the presence of a finished author......He has a command of elegant metaphor, a brilliant imagination, and a genius for subjective analysis."

THE MANIFESTOES OF WILLIAM II.

THERE is no difference of opinion throughout Europe, among those whose opinion is worth regarding, as to the virtues, the ability, and the melancholy fate of the late German Emperor, King FREDERICK of Prussia. Approval of more than the conventional kind may be given to the language used on this occasion by the leaders of the Government and the Opposition in both Houses of Parliament on Monday. It is not the custom of these Houses, as of some other Assemblies, to address foreign monarchs directly on such an occasion; and the relationship of the dead man's wife and her mother to the English people would in any case have made their share in the mourning a matter of first-importance to us. But disinterested as well as interested feelings make the loss which Germany has sustained a matter of direct concernment to England; and of interested feelings themselves there could be no lack. There is, it may be trusted, no fear of seeing Germany hostile to England in any case, or of war supplanting peace as a consequence of the event of last week. Lord GRANVILLE's remarks on this head, though they might perhaps be thought superfluous, were well meant, and should at least be founded on knowledge. But while the Emperor FREDERICK lived it was almost certain that nothing but some very extraordinary circumstance could break the tie which is, perhaps of all ties, the greatest guarantee of peace and tranquillity to Europe. Much debating has taken place—some of it idle—as to various dispositions of the balance of power; the debate having been taken up about the thing, as often happens, just after it had become the fashion of a certain school of historians to laugh at the term. But that a serious and thorough alliance between England and Germany would be proof against any other conceivable combination is as nearly certain as anything can be said to be. And with no Sovereign at the head of the German Empire could such an alliance be thought so likely to be arranged as with him who was buried on Waterloo Day in this present week. The somewhat maimed rites of the funeral are capable, no doubt, of explanation and of excuse; perhaps of very valid explanation. Perhaps the worst thing that can be said for them is their encouragement of the sneer that they are wholly free from hypocrisy, and quite consistent with other characteristics of the new régime. Whether those characteristics are suited to encourage and satisfy the best friends of Germany is, it will be said, a question which is not so easily answered. Here, at any rate, the answer can be coloured by no unfriendliness to Germany, nor by any sneaking kindness for pacific and humanitarian cant.

We believe Prince BISMARCK to be, on the whole, the greatest statesman of Europe. It is our very profound conviction that in a strong, united, and even pugnacious Germany lies the only chance of the salvation of the Continent, and perhaps of England, from the dangers to which the ambition of Russia, the political headlessness of France, the divided condition of Austria, and what may be called the youth and inexperience of Italy, expose it. We were not able to approve the colour, faint as it was, which the inaugural Manifestoes of the late Emperor gave to the suggestion that Germany was going to abandon this position of armed constable of the parish (to use CROMWELL's famous words) for that of respectable private householder. This certainly cannot be charged against the addresses of his successor, and it is interesting to examine with good will, but, it is to be hoped, also with clear sight, what can be said against them on the other side.

Had the Manifestoes to the Army and Navy which was issued earliest been issued alone, it would have been difficult to avoid feeling a certain uneasiness, not at the martial tone of them, but at the tone of their martialness. It is true that such words as "war-lord" have a much more formidable and a much more awkward appearance and sound in English than in German; and it is true, also, that a certain disposition to exaggerate the bellicose note, if in the circumstances of questionable taste, was also in the circumstances far from unnatural. But there were certainly some unpleasant things about these documents. The reference to the dead Emperor stood out, it might be urged, with surely unnecessary sharpness against that to his father, and supplied an unlucky, and almost painful, parallel to the huddling up of the interment of the one as compared with the stately functions attending the interment of the other. The whole of the document or documents, too had, very perceptibly to a Devil's advocate, a flavour of brag and of flourish which might advantageously have been dispensed with in the case of a young man who has never drawn the sword, and who, in the present ostensible circumstances of his affairs, has no decent pretext for assuming that he will draw it. There might be said to be, in short—for we have little desire to dwell on this part of the matter—a sort of sham Spartan air, according too well with the disreputable sentiment of the clique who, as is well known, wished to exclude the Emperor FREDERICK from the throne altogether, as not being in health to play the swashbuckler, and who vented their rage upon Sir MORELL MACKENZIE for not lending himself to their cabal. The military traditions of Germany no doubt include many glorious memories, and her naval traditions, when they come into existence, will doubtless be glorious too. But the latter do not yet exist, and the former are so very considerably chequered that an address which would have been full-mouthed from a Roman general at the climax of the Roman conquest of the world, might be considered a little grandiloquent.

Yet there is perhaps something harsh in this judgment, while the general Proclamation redeems a good deal, and allows the former special allocutions to be consigned, not indeed to complete oblivion, but to comparative forgetfulness, as possibly no more than a little natural outburst of temperament, combined with some calculated flattery to feelings which for the last few months have, whether justly or not, certainly as a matter of fact, been somewhat irritated in Germany. There is nothing either of the popularity-hunter on one side or of the REHOBOAM on the other in the Emperor WILLIAM's words to his people at large, who are, after all, according to German contention, only the army at large. Nothing could be better than the reference to the late Emperor here, which is feeling without being fulsome, and sufficient without being overdone. We at least see no commonplace in the new EMPEROR's version of his royal oath, and nothing either unfounded or superfluous in his reference to history. The "faithful Prince of a faithful "people," using the strength which his father and grandfather have stored up for legitimate purposes, may, and indeed must, prove a valuable addition to the Sovereigns of Europe. It would be possible, no doubt, for a reign of Jew-baiting and of inroads upon the Constitution, of reckless arrogance abroad and of Junkerism at home, in a few months to do more damage than long years of judicious government have done good. But nothing will or can be lost by a distinct understanding that EMPEROR-KING and CHANCELLOR-MINISTER are unflinchingly bent on upholding the system of wise governing as well as reigning which the first Emperor WILLIAM and the still living Prince BISMARCK established and so long carried out.

As for foreign affairs, there is only one danger of real importance. A policy of general aggression can hardly be called by this name; for Germany, strong as she is, is no more able than any other Power to dictate to Europe by herself, and any attempt to do so could only result in the reduction of Prussia once more to the rank of a second-rate State with a complete revolution in the present constitution of Germany. That would be an evil, but it would be an evil which would practically cure itself. What is, though not exactly probable, sufficiently possible to be alarming, is the conception by the young EMPEROR of an idea that, by entering into a closer alliance with Russia, and by loosening the ties with Austria, he may raise the German Empire to an even greater height of dominion and of prosperity than it at present occupies. That such an idea would be contrary to all the best interests of Germany, and would incur in the attempt to realize it the difficulty of a real and an abiding conflict of temper and of wishes between the German and the Russian peoples, is perfectly true. But it is the kind of idea which has before now occurred to young princes of more military temper than military experience, and there is no doubt that the entertainment of it would be a serious misfortune to Europe. It is not likely to be encouraged in reality by Prince BISMARCK; but some recent words of the Prince's may seem to encourage it, and the CHANCELLOR, like his masters, is not immortal. All that can be said at present is, that there is nothing immediately alarming in the accession of the monarch whom his flatterers call "the new FREDERICK"; but that it behoves all possessors of Silesias in any part of the world by no means to intermit preparations which may enable them to keep their house armed, or, better still, to discourage all notion of attempts upon it.

LIFE PEERS.

AS leader of the House of Lords Lord SALISBURY is not accustomed to address a cold and unsympathizing, though acquiescent, audience; but his most ardent adherents scarcely disguised their want of enthusiasm for the proposal of a system of life peerages and of a censorship over delinquent members of the House. The orator shared or anticipated the indifference with which the announcement of his intentions was received. Lord SALISBURY had no inconsistency to excuse, though on such a question a change of opinion might have excited little surprise. He has always differed from the majority of his party as to the expediency of creating life peers, having, as he stated, voted with Lord RUSSELL in favour of a similar scheme on first taking his seat as a peer twenty years ago. Two separate issues had been raised by the elevation of Baron PARKES to the barony of Wensleydale for his own life. Lord CRANWORTH, who as Chancellor was responsible for the nature of the patent, was the only lawyer in the House of Lords who held that Lord WENSLEYDALE was entitled to a seat. Even if the law had been on the side of the Ministers, their reliance on a supposed prerogative after a discontinuance of four hundred years was obviously and grossly unconstitutional. A much shorter time had elapsed since the practical abandonment by the Crown of the right of veto. It is true that the establishment of life peerages at the will of a Minister would be a less inconvenient and less dangerous encroachment than the rejection of a Bill after it had passed both Houses of Parliament; but it has become a constitutional rule that no dormant prerogative can be revived except by Act of Parliament. To Lord SALISBURY's proposal there can be no technical objection. The Legislature can authorize the creation of peerages to endure for the life of the incumbent, or for a year or a day.

It happened that by a statement which was not essential to his main argument Lord SALISBURY conclusively proved that Lord LYNDHURST, Lord CAMPBELL, and their legal colleagues had been in the right in their opposition to the claim of Lord WENSLEYDALE. Admitting that there had been no creation of life peerages since the accession of the TUDOR dynasty, Lord SALISBURY added that this had in earlier times been often granted, but only with the assent of Parliament. In other words, there was not even in the middle ages a precedent for the creation of life-peerages. It is evident that in dispensing with the essential condition of the concurrence of Parliament Lord PALMERSTON's Government had, though perhaps unintentionally, attempted a flagrant usurpation. Lord SALISBURY, who was in no degree responsible for the irregularity, was perfectly at liberty to vote for the introduction of life peers by Act of Parliament. It is not known whether he attached any considerable importance to the measure, but if he entertained a strong conviction on the subject his zeal has in twenty years had time to cool. The tone of his speech was as dispassionate as the corresponding temper of the House. Lord SALISBURY has apparently made up his mind that some concession to a popular demand may be granted without serious disadvantage. There is no reason to suppose that he expects any great public benefit from the elevation of a few generals, admirals, and judges to a peerage of a novel kind. The dignitaries of the law, the army, the navy, and the Civil Service will in some cases possess special qualifications for certain kinds of legislation. If they are selected with a decent regard to their personal eminence, they will not be more revolutionary in their disposition than their hereditary colleagues; and even if they incline to Liberal opinions there would be some advantage in a more equal division of parties in the House. A proposal so apparently modest could scarcely have been put forward in language of fervid eloquence.

If Lord SALISBURY had been otherwise actuated by parental fondness for his scheme he would not have forgotten a practical dilemma which he was perhaps the first to perceive. Every reform must purport to be an improvement of the institution to which it is applied. Any improvement must be presumed to add an element of strength, and therefore a reform of the House of Lords ought to make it more efficient. Lord SALISBURY would decline to be responsible for any change which would tend to a contrary result, and he knows that the movement in which he to some extent joins originates in hostility to the House of Lords. A part of his speech consisted of a series of good-humoured sarcasms on the contrivances which have been with unprofitable ingenuity devised by Lord ROSEBERY and Lord DUNRAVEN. Their schemes would not have commanded the approval of Liberal politicians if they had seemed likely to effect their purpose. Sweeping changes might have been tolerated on the ground that a mushroom institution would be more liable to attack and destruction than an ancient system which had accumulated on itself some anomalies in the course of time. Lord DUNRAVEN's plan of giving seats to the Chairmen of the new Councils would have been ridiculous enough to recommend itself to the enemies of a Second Chamber. It was Lord SALISBURY's business, as he has accepted the principle of innovation, to devise some plan which may possibly be expedient, and to avoid the paradoxes which beset his competitors in legislation. They have, in fact, done a service by reducing, if not to absurdity, at least to impossibility, the vague projects which had been propounded by less loyal reformers. Lord SALISBURY was content to remind them that, if their schemes were good in themselves, they would thwart the designs of their political allies.

If there are to be life peers, the proposed limitation of their number seems to be neither too lax nor unnecessarily stringent. The Crown is to appoint, if it thinks fit, five in a year, until the maximum number of fifty is reached. Besides the generals and admirals and the rest, there are to be a few eminent persons at large, who will, it is supposed, be ornaments to the House. The new recruits will, unless Governments grossly misuse their patronage, be uniformly respectable. At present it is impossible to estimate their number. Lord SALISBURY hopes that the power of annual creations will not be fully exercised, but it seems more probable that successive Administrations will find reasons for correcting the undue liberality or negligence of their respective predecessors. There is a visible tendency to multiply and cheapen the titles of honour which ought to be reserved as the cheapest rewards of genuine merit. Titles of nobility will, as long as their holders share the lustre of the hereditary peerage, be preferred to Grand Crosses and places in the Privy Council. Indeed, the Privy Council is to be in certain cases a stepping-stone to the peerage, and the recipient of the minor decorations will often put pressure on the Government to grant him an additional step in the hierarchy of honours. With its new alloy the peerage will, at least for a time, be highly valued; and possibly some of the newcomers may take a useful part in the business of the House. Their assistance will be welcomed, though it will seldom be needed. It is not for want of ability and knowledge that the House of Lords is in some quarters unpopular. The provisions for a moral and social censorship will probably be reconsidered. To many persons it seems that no such jurisdiction was necessary, and that, as in many other cases, a discredited man of rank should only be punished by notoriety or insignificance. Lord SALISBURY expresses no strong opinion in favour of measures for the purification of the House of Lords, which has, in fact, suffered but little discredit from the misconduct of a few of its members. Dishonesty or gross licentiousness already exclude guilty peers or commoners from the society of their equals. There will be little advantage in proceedings which will only give additional publicity to scandalous stories. No consideration or delicacy is due to the offenders, but it may be doubted whether the House of Lords is the fittest tribunal. If there are to be penal proceedings, it seems reasonable that they should take the form of suspension of the writ of summons. The world also sometimes condones some misdemeanours after a certain lapse of time.

TREASURE-HUNTING IN PERU.

"HERE'S the rich Peru," says MAMMON in the Alchemist, "and here within, sir, are the golden "mines, great SOLOMON's Ophir!" The rich Peru has long been less than golden, except for its guano, but a new Company (Limited) at Mollendo intends to restore its wealth. If ever there was a literal case of "money-grubbing," it is the case of the "Compañía Anonima Exploradora de las "Hucas del Inca." Peru is one of the lands where treasure-hunting is epidemic. Though the Spanish conquerors left no stone unturned, and perhaps no likely person untortured, people still think there must be hidden millions of gold and silver and precious stones. "What's "become of all the gold?" they cry, like a character of Mr. BROWNING's, who was thinking, however, of the Venetian ladies' tresses, not of more commonplace and marketable treasures. Probably all the gold was frittered away in gambling, as by that famed soldier who lost in a night the golden sun of the Sun's great temple. The European market drained Peru of the precious metals, wrought or unwrought; yet, among the vast and stable ruins of Cyclopean cities, it is natural for spectators to believe that there must be wealth concealed in one corner or another. Tradition has not forgotten the great golden chain of Cuzco, which was long enough to go all round the central square of the city. Legend yet speaks of hiding-places known only to the Incas, and undiscovered by processes of torture. Legend lives on such beliefs, yet we may be pretty sure that, if the Incas had secret treasure chambers, they have been robbed in the last three hundred years, even as the central chamber of the Great Pyramid will prove to have been, if ever it is opened. Dr. SCHLIEMANN only succeeded at Mycenæ because every one had heard that the treasure-house of ATREUS was, not a humble sepulchre hidden in a corner, but the colossal building which PAUSANIAS likened to the Pyramids.

Perhaps it is on this hint of the lowly but opulent Mycenæan graves that the Mollendo Company is acting. They mean to explore the old Peruvian tombs near Cuzco, and we presume they have satisfied themselves, first, that no other "barrow-wight" has been there before them. Like other nations, the Peruvians occasionally buried treasure with their dead, but we do not think that they buried very much, or that excavators have found more than earthenware pots, mummies, cheap ornaments, and here and there a small silver lama, a group of figures in silver, or a necklace or ring. A few examples may be seen at the British Museum, and they are far from suggesting wealth beyond the dream of avarice. It is only in very heroic ages, among very emotional people, that the dead carry much wealth with them into the land of the shadow. ACHILLES equipped the dead PATROCLUS royally, ATTILA was covered with his golden plunder; for some unknown reason the dead men of Mycenæ were buried with a valuable hoard. There are two reasons for this generosity on the part of the living heirs. The dead are furnished with wealth for their use in the next world, that is the first reason. The second influence which prompts men to bury treasure with the dead is the hope that the ghost will guard it. Now, in the first case, the gifts to the dead are usually meagre—only his personal ornaments and weapons, with some money, if it be a country of coined money. Peru, we think, was ignorant of coinage; but, even where money is coined, it soon becomes usual to put the dead off with mere shabby semblances and ghosts of the actual currency. A pot full of specimens of Egyptian ghosts' money may be seen in Mr. FLINDERS PETRIE's collection from the Fayoum at the Egyptian Hall in Piccadilly. The Peruvian Company will be sadly disappointed if they find nothing better than that. Who steals a ghost's purse steals trash indeed, when the purse is so poorly replenished. In the other case, where the ghost is expected to guard the large treasure (as when the Buccaneers killed men over their hoards), then the secret of the hoard is kept, and handed on by the men who concealed it. They, or their descendants (who have the ghost on their side, and are not afraid of him) are likely to open the grave at a pinch. Probably the wealthy graves near Cuzco, if such graves there were, have been opened long ago. Most known treasures have been rifled, and nothing but bullets and spoiled American woods were found, some years ago, in the sunk vessels of the Plato fleet in Vigo Bay. However, the Company at Mollendo may do a good deal for archæology, while they are hunting for gold and for the emeralds that the Incas worshipped in their temples. Moreover, they will get the funds as treasure-hunters which the public would not subscribe for antiquarian research.

CHINESE IMMIGRATION.

THE decision of the Australasian Congress to entrust the conduct of their dispute with the Chinese to the Home Government has temporarily at least diminished the danger of the situation. It removes the risk likely to be caused by sudden violent measures. But it is premature to decide that the worst danger is passed. We have yet to learn whether the real wishes of the Colonies are compatible with the view China is likely to take of the question. All that the Australians have to complain of in the Chinese may be true, and may entitle them to our sympathy. They cut down wages, and so offend the workmen on whom Colonial as well as English politicians depend for their seats; their vices are not our vices; they may swarm in and swamp the men of English race. All this may be true; but, if it were ten times more certain than it is, the fact remains that China will have reason to complain if her subjects are excluded from any part of the British dominions, and that, when China has a case, she can make the most of it. It is superfluous to inquire whether Lord KNUTSFORD and Baron DE WORMS were right or not in asserting that the treaties in force between the two countries, though they bind China to admit Englishmen and their goods to certain ports, do not bind England to admit Chinamen freely to her territories. The spokesmen of the Colonial Office would seem to be wrong on the matter of fact; but, even if no express stipulation existed giving Chinamen the right of free entry, its absence could be explained by the fact that it would have been superfluous. For half a century or so we have been engaged in alternately persuading or forcing China to enter into freer relations with us. We have argued that, as we allowed all the world free access to our ports, we had a right to demand at least some approach to that freedom from others. To enforce our arguments we have burned Chinese cities, knocked down Chinese forts, killed Chinese soldiers, and sunk Chinese junks. It will be somewhat awkward if we have to turn round and take up the position of our old enemy.

No doubt the diplomatic difficulty would be got rid of by a free use of what may be called the Quia nominor Leo argument. As we are strong enough to smash Chinese towns again, we may insist that we alone have the right to interpret treaties and define obligations. But there are reasons why this effective, though logically illegitimate, process cannot be used. It remains to be seen whether the Chinese Government would accept this view; and if it did not, then we could only enforce it at the expense of a temporary and perhaps prolonged suspension of the China trade, which is not a sacrifice to be lightly incurred at the end of a long period of commercial depression. The Chinese are doubtless well aware of the strength of their position, and will, unless their character has undergone a remarkable change, make the most of it. Unfortunately it is quite possible, though not very probable, that we may have to choose between two serious evils. If the Colonies are as intent as they are said to be on the exclusion of the Chinese, they may give the Imperial Government the choice between either backing them or quarrelling with them. In British Columbia special legislation against the Chinese has been set aside by the decision of the law Courts. It has been declared illegitimate on the ground on which the Supreme Court of the United States would set aside the legislation of any particular State which happened to conflict with Federal treaties. But Australia and New Zealand are not British Columbia, and the British Empire is not the United States. If the passions excited are as angry as they are said to be, it is quite conceivable that the greater Colonies would simply refuse to be bound by the decisions of the Colonial Office or even of the Judical Committee of the Privy Council. In that case a very serious issue would be set before us. It is unnecessary to suppose that things are likely to come to so bad a pass as this; but they may, and the possibility must be faced. How the danger is to be averted is not at present at all clear. Before deciding, it will be necessary to find out how far the Colonies are really prepared to go, and what compromise the Chinese Government will be prepared to accept. To find these things out is the work of the Home Government, which happily has received a promise that the Colonies will listen to it. Unless the anger of New South Wales and New Zealand is a temporary affair—a mere flash-in-the-pan—the Colonial Office has none the less a difficult task before it—one which will have to be performed in a spirit of statesmanship, and not huddled through by the help of the temporary expedients and routine which have too often been the resources of the department. The Imperial Government must itself negotiate with the Tsung li Yamen. As the Government of China is known not to favour the emigration of its subjects, and as it has already agreed to accept special legislation against the Chinese in the United States, an arrangement may possibly be made. But China has means of putting a pressure on us which it could not put on the United States, and human nature will be very peculiar in the Middle Kingdom if advantage is not taken of this fact. A price will be asked for the concession, and we have yet to learn what that price will be. Also, from the very nature of things, that price will be paid by the Imperial Government, and not by the Colonies.

RICHMOND PARK AND THE VOLUNTEERS.

LORD WANTAGE and the other members of the deputation which waited lately on the FIRST COMMISSIONER of WORKS have thrown much fresh light on the infelicitous proposal to transfer the Wimbledon rifle range to Richmond Park. In showing that they are able to meet the objection originally urged against the project, they have revealed others of a new and no less formidable kind. According to the Council of the National Rifle Association, no entrenching operations of any kind will be required to adapt "one of the noblest of the Royal "parks" to the purpose for which it is desired to use it. It will be a mere matter of cutting down a few score trees and leaving a few score others to serve as mantlets for the bullets of the competing marksmen, and the thing is done. The spot chosen for the butts, and which apparently has been already inspected in as businesslike a manner as though the plan were on the eve of a cordial acceptance by the public, lies between the Roehampton Gate and the Robin Hood Gate—a space of about 400 acres—"from "which the public are already excluded," and the enclosure of which is chiefly used for growing hay for the service of the deer in the Park. No great loss would be incurred by surrendering the annual value of this hay; and though it would be necessary to exclude the public from the rest of the Park during the fortnight of the annual meeting, they would be admitted on the two Sundays. On the whole, it was in the opinion of the Council "not much to ask" that the public should thus slightly abridge their enjoyment of the Park for the sake of a great national object.

This way of putting the case is at once so plausible and so invidious that until we consider how easy it would be to support even a ten times more unreasonable proposal by precisely the same appeal we may probably find some difficulty in meeting it. A little reflection, however, will soon enable most people to see that the "national object" argument proves a great deal too much, and that, as it would be just as applicable to a proposal, for instance, to convert Trafalgar Square into a drill-ground by pulling down the Nelson Column, filling up the fountains, and levelling the terrace, we are thrown back upon the simple counter proposition that every plan of the kind, whether it can plead a national object or not, must be considered on its own merits and weighed against alternative proposals. And when the particular plan is so considered and so weighed with its competitors, its merits will surely appear to most of us not only to sustain so very inadequately the contest with its defects, but compare so very unfavourably with the positive recommendations of so many rival schemes, that one is astonished to observe the strong support which it has secured from an otherwise sensible and practical body of men. Even if Richmond Park possessed ideal qualification for supplying the place of Wimbledon Common, we ought undoubtedly to hesitate long before we turn any part of it into a rifle range at the cost, to mention no other of the numerous objections, of cutting down even a less number than "a "hundred valuable and important trees." But, as a matter of fact, the qualifications of Richmond Park to succeed Wimbledon Common are not in the least ideal. It is, on the contrary, defective in this respect, at what we cannot but consider one of the most important points. Nobody suggests that the Park, whether suitable or not for a shooting-ground, is a fit place for a camp; yet nobody, apparently, on the Council of the Association seems to have considered this side of the question as at all material. To the general public, however, it will be regarded as a most important element in the case. If opinions differ on Sir JOHN WHITAKER ELLIS'S proposal to transfer the meeting to Aldershot, there will be a general agreement in the principle that camp training and completeness of marksmanship should be as far as possible combined with each other, and that, while there are plenty of places in England, and some at no very great distance from London, where the combination can be effected, Richmond Park is the one place where it is impossible.

THE LICENSING CLAUSES.

IN the matter of the licensing clauses the Government has touched pitch, and it has not absolutely escaped defilement. The noisy demand for Local Option had been more than once staved off by the allegation that the choice could not be properly exercised until some representative body had been constituted to act in the name of the ratepayers. The proposed establishment of County and District Councils rendered the excuse no longer applicable, and it therefore seemed necessary to introduce the licensing clauses into the Local Government Bill. The municipal authorities were to acquire the power of closing public-houses on Sundays and of refusing the renewal of licences, subject to payment of reasonable compensation. Mr. RITCHIE, in his opening speech, fortunately took the precaution of announcing that the clauses must be accepted or rejected as a whole. He had probably foreseen the objections which would be made to a portion of the clauses by the temperance agitators, though he may not have been prepared for the unscrupulous violence of the attack. It seemed probable that moderate opposition would be conciliated by the provision as to Sunday closing, and by the transfer of the licensing jurisdiction from the Justices to the nominees of the ratepayers. Mr. GLADSTONE and a majority of his followers were pledged to the principle of compensation, and perhaps the Ministers may have thought that their proposals would be more acceptable because they were obviously just. When the leaders of the Opposition at first expressed a general approval of the Bill, it was erroneously supposed that they would assist the Government to pass it. The anticipated hostility of Sir WILFRID LAWSON and his adherents seemed in the circumstances not to be formidable.

The hostile faction was easily defeated on the issue between a popular decree and the decision of a representative body. It is true that the local majority can control the municipal elections, but its nominees will have a sense of responsibility which might not be shared by the body of ratepayers. After all the eloquence which has been bestowed on the glorification of elective local government, it was absurd to deprive the new Councils of one of their principal functions. The more thorny dispute on the payment of compensation would have been sufficiently troublesome if it had been confined within the walls of Parliament. The prospects of a settlement were suddenly impaired or destroyed by the accident of a vacancy in the representation of Southampton. The Gladstonian Liberals, instead of relying on their advocacy of Home Rule, sought and gained the alliance of the temperance party, including a large contingent of professed Unionists. It appeared that the constituency, which at the last election returned a Conservative member, cared more for the disestablishment and punishment of the licensed victuallers than for the integrity of the United Kingdom. The Ministerial candidate was defeated by a large majority, which apparently cared nothing for general politics. Soon afterwards the agitators assembled a great crowd in Hyde Park to affirm the doctrine which had prevailed at Southampton. In defiance of justice, common sense, and of uninterrupted precedent, the demagogues and their dupes maintained that a property which they estimate at the value of three or four hundred millions should be destroyed for the supposed public benefit without any cost to the public. The West Indian slave-owners were justly compensated for the loss of a property which, however objectionable it might be in its nature, had been created and recognized by the Imperial Parliament and Government. On the abolition of purchase in the army, the holders of commissions were not less justly compensated for their interest in a notoriously illegal practice, because it had existed with the connivance of the authorities. The trade in alcoholic liquors has from time immemorial been as lawful as that of a butcher or a baker, although it required a formal licence, which, in default of misconduct, was annually renewed as a matter of course. The temperance fanatics protested against compensation when they, in common with the rest of the community, believed that licences were renewable as of right. Since a recent judicial decision has contravened the general opinion, the claim of the owners and occupiers of public-houses ought perhaps strictly to be limited to the value of a chance of renewal which practically amounted to a certainty. The refusal of payment would be as gross an abuse of legislative power as if there had been no doubtful element in the calculation. A vested interest may be broadly defined as any right or possession which can be sold in the market. A publican or other tradesman who purchases the good-will of a business buys not only the lease or freehold of the premises, but the chance that customers will frequent his stores. The renewal of a licence has hitherto been much less uncertain than the continuance of custom. The wildly exaggerated estimates of the amount of property which might be destroyed would, if they were accurate, furnish conclusive proof of the equitable claim of the holders. The representatives of the trade had assented to an increase in the cost of licences, which would to a certain extent have relieved the ratepayers of the burden of compensation. It is impossible to estimate the amount which would have been required. There is no reason to assume that the Councils would have engaged in a general crusade against public-houses. Notwithstanding a considerable diminution in the consumption of beer and spirits, the habits of the country are not yet materially changed. The Councils would hesitate to inflict serious inconvenience on their constituents by summarily closing their customary places of refreshment. At the worst, there would be, if temperance orators may be trusted, an ample fund from which compensation might be drawn. None of their commonplaces are more familiar to readers of newspapers than the statement that the disuse of alcoholic liquors would produce a saving to the community large enough to meet in two or three years any possible demand for compensation. After that time, the whole amount would be available for general purposes, or it might fructify in the pockets of the people.

The Southampton election and the subsequent proceedings in the House of Commons illustrated the incurable levity of popular sentiment, and imposed on the Government the necessity of withdrawing the licence clauses. If the question of compensating disestablished publicans were thought to involve more vital issues than the maintenance of the Union, the Government majority was virtually dissolved until the temperance agitation was abated or suspended. Like the obedient votaries of the Romish Church who are Catholics first and Englishmen afterwards, the devotees of temperance, including recently converted ascetics, such as Mr. Gladstone and Sir William Harcourt, are teetotallers first, and some of them are patriots afterwards. Government and legislation are difficult under such conditions, but Lord Salisbury and his colleagues have to deal with Parliament as it has been affected by recent constitutional improvements. The right of withdrawing the licensing clauses, though it had been expressly reserved, was subject to the contingency which has actually occurred. Sir William Harcourt and his party dispute the expediency of postponing the discussion, though they cannot but know that the retention of the mutilated proposal would compel the abandonment of the entire Bill. It would be highly unjust to confer on the Councils powers which might be used for the injury of the publicans before the general control of the trade is transferred to the new authorities. The issue of compensation will perhaps be more conveniently raised when the machinery of local government has been in the first instance provided. It is true that the late agitation has largely modified any sanguine expectations which might have been founded on the project of representative government in counties. It is no longer worth while to speculate on the greater or less probability that experienced justices may be preferred as members or chairmen of County and District Councils. Personal qualifications will be as little regarded at municipal elections as during the Parliamentary contest at Southampton. A successful candidate will be not the best administrator or the most experienced man of business, but either the most devoted propagator of compulsory abstinence or perhaps the trusted favourite of the publicans and brewers. For some years past the urban Corporations have, to the great disadvantage of the community, been principally chosen with reference to political parties. The conflict in local constituencies on the issue of Local Option or of compensation will be a lower form of degradation. It is well that the project of reforming the House of Lords by raising county chairmen to the peerage has not yet been adopted. A section of the House consisting of ennobled teetotallers would present a curious spectacle.

THE CHARENTE ELECTION.

It is a sign of the very genuine fear felt of General Boulanger and his following of "autre-chosistes" that the defeat of M. Déroulède in the Charente should apparently have caused some surprise in Paris. As a natural consequence, there is a tendency to exaggerate the severity of the check given to the General. The wonderful thing is that a candidate representing him, and him only, should have polled 20,000 votes out of a total of 75,300. The department of the Charente is very Bonapartist. A candidate of that party stood on the present occasion—M. Gellibert des Séguins. There was also a strong local Republican candidate—M. Weiller. To oppose them General Boulanger sent down the most featherheaded of mankind with a recommendation worded in a fashion worthy of the Count of Chambord. To vote for M. Déroulède, said the General, is to vote for me. Twenty thousand voters were found to think this recommendation enough. No other public man in France since Gambetta's death could have published a congé d'élire like this without covering himself with ridicule. But, though the General has failed to secure the return of his man, it cannot be said that a candidature which secured more than a fourth of the total votes cast was purely ridiculous. As M. Gellibert des Séguins only received 31,401 votes, he had not an absolute majority, and there will, therefore, according to the French custom, be a second ballot a fortnight hence. It is possible that the result may be interesting. M. Déroulède has retired, and it will be instructive to see what becomes of the votes given to him. There will obviously be very different deductions to be drawn according to whether they are given to M. Gellibert des Séguins, as the Boulangist Committee seem to recommend, or to M. Weiller, or are merely withheld. In the first case, the Charente form of Boulangism will be shown to be absolutely hostile to the Republic; in the second, it will appear to be mainly a vague desire that the Republican form of government should be strengthened for administrative purposes; in the third, it may be taken to be merely one sign among others of the rather vague disgust with all political things which is steadily spreading in France.

Sensible observers are, in any case, well aware that the result of the Charente election is in no way a victory for the cause of stability in France. All the candidates were alike in favour of revision. M. Gellibert des Séguin's views need no explanation, and if M. Déroulède's politics are somewhat hazy, his desire to recast the present form of government is altogether beyond doubt. These two are more or less open enemies, but even the Republican candidate, M. Weiller, was no friend. He also found it necessary to announce that he was in favour of Revision. It is true that he qualified his support of this disturbing proposal by saying that his revision was to be according to M. Floquet, and nobody has ever yet heard what this exactly means. But this is a matter of detail. The essential is that all the votes given in the Charente were hostile in various degrees, if not to the Republic, then at least to its existing form. To those who are in favour of the present Constitution, and who dread the consequences of embarking on a new course of experiment and adventure, the success of any of the three candidates would have been unwelcome. The election in the Charente is regarded by them as having brought nearer the evil day of revision. It is an extraordinary proof of the political confusion and incapacity of France that, though instability and experiments are widely dreaded, there cannot be said to be any effective militant party in favour of the present Constitution. However much politicians differ from one another, they all agree that in time of difficulty the safe resource is to upset and abolish the existing Government. As long as that creed continues to prevail there can be no stability in French affairs. It is probable that M. FLOQUET's idea of a revision is a revision which is a good way off. But he will hardly be able to choose his time; and if the failure of M. DÉROULÈDE gives rise to a belief that General BOULANGER's influence is sinking, there will be less than ever the inclination to postpone the date. What the revision will be when it comes there can be no means of knowing. Only this much is certain, that it will unsettle everything, and may produce violent disorder. It cannot encourage those who are anxious to avoid this risk to see that the absentees in the Charente have considerably increased since the last general election. In spite of the real gravity of the crisis, twelve thousand fewer voters have thought it necessary to cast their votes. Their abstention may, perhaps, be attributed to unwillingness to support any Revisionist; but, if that was the case, they should have found a representative of their own. Even twelve thousand votes in favour of the existing Constitution would work on what they think the right side. Unfortunately Frenchmen who dislike adventures and risks rarely do act, and their abstention leaves the field open to the disorderly minorities.

AYR AND THANET.

THE remembrance of Southampton and the prospect of Thanet can hardly be said to make the study of the Ayr election more cheerful; but they certainly make it much more interesting and important. For our part, we have not the slightest intention of "making a poor mouth" over any of the three, and the chief reason for dwelling on Ayr is Thanet. It is, unfortunately, only too evident what the reasons of the Ayr defeat were; and, still more unfortunately, they are the very worst reasons at all possible. To attempt to explain away a defeat is admittedly the idlest of occupations; we do not know one less idle than the attempt to explain the morals of one. Of course such morals are quite obvious enough; but the recurrence of the defeats themselves is more than a sufficient excuse for repeating the lesson even to such exceedingly dull and obstinate scholars as, we regret to say, the leaders of the Unionist party, in electioneering matters, appear to be. After Southampton especially, though the lesson of Gower in one sense and of Deptford in another was plain enough, we frankly confess that the management of the Ayr election appears to us simply incomprehensible except on the supposition either that headquarters or local managers lost their heads completely, or that one or the other desired that a seat should be lost, and lost in a peculiarly striking manner.

Any one with the slightest practical knowledge of, or even general natural gift for, election matters must have seen that the Ayr Burghs were a very ticklish seat. There was apparently an enormous Unionist majority, and an enormous majority often has, in a different way, the same defects as a too willing witness. But, in the second place, it could be seen with half an eye that this majority was utterly fallacious. It had, in the first place, been obtained by one of those strong local candidates whose polls give absolutely no idea of the normal strength of parties as distinguished from partisans. It had, in the second place, been obtained in the heat and fervour of the Unionist crusade of 1886 against Mr. GLADSTONE. Further, the person who obtained it was a strong Liberal, and had in 1885, as a Gladstonian, beaten a Conservative candidate, though by no extraordinarily great majority. In the recent contest all these conditions, so favourable to Unionist success, were reversed. The known man was on the side of the Gladstonians; the local and minor influences were mostly on the same side; the Government had not been doing well, either at the polls or in Parliament. In any case it is always a very difficult thing to canvass these collections of burghs situated at great distances from each other, jealous of each other, and prone each to take offence at supposed preference given to their companions and rivals. It is, we believe, the almost universal rule that when a man gets "well in" he holds them, short of a political convulsion, for life or a long term; but that it is very difficult to get well in. On every ground, then, there was reason for choosing the strongest candidate possible. In saying that Mr. EVELYN ASHLEY was one of the weakest possible we throw not the slightest reflection on him personally, and, on the contrary, we desire to express the warmest approval of the pluck with which he has fought battle after battle, undaunted by defeat after defeat, in the Unionist cause. Intellectually, as well as in position, in experience, in everything that makes a good member of Parliament, he was immeasurably his opponent's superior. But the qualities of a good member of Parliament and the qualities of a good candidate are unfortunately two entirely different sets of things. Electors are rarely good judges of the former; they know at once what they think to be the latter. For the Ayr Burghs Mr. ASHLEY had no one candidate's qualification that we can discern. He was a stranger; and even in this day the spirit of the famous answer, "Na! "Na! There's nae Christians here. We'se a' ELLIOTS and "JARDINES" is far from being extinct in Scotland. He was not even a Scotchman; and though it would be too much to say that Scotch constituencies will never elect Englishmen, it is certainly not too much to say that they would much rather not. He was an Irish landlord; that is to say, a person exposed to the most abundant, highly-coloured, and, to the democratic part of the constituency, most effective falsehoods of a party which seldom opens its mouth without falsifying something. All the fads were got to oppose him; and his opponent was himself certainly a member of the largest, the most influential, and the most politically unscrupulous sect of Scotch Dissenters, which is particularly strong in the West. Finally, he was a Liberal-Unionist, and if the Liberal-Unionists supported him strongly, of which there is not much evidence, the Tory-Unionists, who had made so brave a fight on their own hand against Mr. CAMPBELL three years ago, were pretty certainly not active in his favour, and Toryism contributed little, if any, general support to his cause. So he lost the seat; and it would have been something like a miracle if he had gained it.

The worst aspect of the matter, and perhaps the only aspect which really deserves notice at this time of day, is that these are all general causes, all perfectly obvious to any man of sense and discernment, and all of them certain to operate more or less in any future election. Most of them could have been understood and their working foreseen by such a man, even though he had never set foot in any one of the burghs in his life, and had never so much as heard any private intelligence of their condition. Some things in the Southampton case might have escaped a party manager who put his confidence too completely in local deputies; in the Ayr case this was impossible. Unless some fatal delicacy prevented the Government Whips from interfering with or catechizing the Liberal-Unionist Whips, or unless the Government Whips let this all-important part of the business slide altogether; or, thirdly—most charitably—unless the local managers are both stupid and obstinate almost beyond belief, the disaster could not have occurred. Perhaps, indeed, a little of all these things happened, and was rendered not merely damaging, but disastrous, by the addition of a little something else. That something else can only have been what we must call the insensate refusal of all authorities concerned to recognize the conditions of modern electioneering, simple as they are and constantly as they are illustrated both by successes and disasters. Many as are the excuses which may be made for the separate establishments of Tory and of Liberal Unionism, we have from the first felt and said that the drawbacks of them are of the most serious description. In more ways than one, and especially in electioneering ways, it appears to be thought that, if by or without mutual agreement, a Tory candidate is chosen for a place where the Tories are strongest and a Liberal one in others, and if Liberals or Tories, as the case may be, are politely requested by their own leaders to vote for the selected person, enough has been done. A wilder delusion never entered into the head of man. Except in a very few cases, the utmost efforts of both parties working together, and working each as if the candidate represented their own side, are needed against an opposition which is for the time perfectly homogeneous, absolutely unscrupulous, and not merely induced but [illegible] to sink all minor differences. A Gladstonian will pledge himself to any fad, and few, if any, Gladstonian voters will vote against him because he is pledged to it. He will qualify his Home Rule professions with any saving clause; and few, if any, Gladstonians care even to ask whether such a qualification is consistent either with the declarations of Mr. GLADSTONE or the expectations of the Parnellites. He thus sweeps all his own voters into his net without difficulty, and the weaker faddists on the other side as well. To oppose these tactics we have (with some good exceptions which have almost invariably been rewarded with success) either a Tory candidate who is at once deserted by Liberal-Unionist faddists and by some who have not even the wretched excuse of fads, or a Liberal-Unionist candidate in a similar plight, both being for the most part hampered also by the awkwardness naturally felt by men who, after long fighting on opposite sides, now march shoulder to shoulder. We do not know on which of the two Unionist sections the greatest blame is incumbent, and we do not care. What we care about and what we know is, that it is the first and greatest duty of the party managers to act together in every case, to take means for the haranguing, the canvassing, the driving to the poll of voters of each class by agents of their own persuasion. For the Union we have, in the long run, very little fear, knowing well that, if Mr. MORLEY and Mr. PARNELL had their way with it to-day, it would be necessary to invent a new one to-morrow. But the failure to fight its battles wisely means national disgrace and disaster of the most serious kind in the meanwhile; and it means something more. It means that the management of the Unionist party is convicted of gross political incapacity.

MR. SAYCE'S HIBBERT LECTURES.

MODERN inspired works are dangerous to tackle; happily (as was said of the British infantry) there are not many of them. Into a notice of the latest "inspirational" book—Mr. LAURENCE OLIPHANT'S Scientific Religion (Saturday Review, June 2, 1888)—an inexplicable error found its way, and, still more unluckily, another false impression was produced. Mr. OLIPHANT'S volume was composed in an unusual or "inspirational" manner, for the author's thoughts "were projected into his mind with the "greatest rapidity," apparently by some external intellectual force not his own, if we correctly apprehend him. Perhaps the action of a similar, but demoniacal and delusive, inspiration may account for the errors of Mr. OLIPHANT'S reviewer. Probably the first thing that strikes a reader of his book is the curious effect produced when Mr. OLIPHANT, writing, as it seems, under some sort of inspiration, argues with authors of books on religion who make no pretensions to be inspired. Mr. OLIPHANT can tell us of sentient and moral atoms, and all about the beginnings of human fortunes, and of the relations of man to the spiritual world. It seems odd, then, that he should take less knowing authors au sérieux.

Doubtless this idea was "projected with great force," but in a very confused fashion, into the mind of the reviewer in our columns. It is there remarked that Mr. OLIPHANT "takes the Hibbert Lectures seriously," and that an inspirational critic should take any uninspired authors seriously is, to say the least, a great compliment. But the context leaves the impression that the Hibbert Lectures in general, and Mr. SAYCE'S Lectures on Babylonian Religion in particular, do not deserve serious consideration. This is a position which no one could maintain for a moment. Mr. SAYCE'S Lectures were noticed in the Saturday Review at the time of their publication, and their scholarship, learning, and originality are generally acknowledged. Doubtless no work in such obscure matter is to be regarded as final, nor can any writer expect all his conclusions to be universally accepted; but the merit of the Lectures is incontestable, and is a merit of original research. To a certain extent, however, it has been contested (in the Revue de l'Histoire des Religions, Paris, March–April, 1858) by M. HALÉVY. To this criticism the reviewer referred as a thing with which an "inspirational" writer like Mr. OLIPHANT should be acquainted even before its appearance in print. By that unfortunate "projection of thoughts" which has already been hinted at, and by an inexplicable confusion of names, M. HALÉVY was spoken of not as M. MEILHAC even, but as M. OPPERT. The slip of memory and of the pen is the more unaccountable as M. OPPERT is of Mr. SAYCE'S opinion, and is even referred to in such terms by M. HALÉVY in the article in the Revue. This mistake, which we very sincerely regret, has naturally astonished and annoyed M. OPPERT, Mr. SAYCE, and probably M. HALÉVY. But blunders appear to be inseparable from the topic, as the Revue on its cover calls Mr. SAYCE "M. SAYRE," and Arcadia is put for Accadia in a foot-note to M. HALÉVY'S article. We do not, of course, intend to enter into the criticisms which M. HALÉVY makes on the ideas and translations of Mr. SAYCE. Apparently a national feeling is not absent from his essay, and his theories; for he is partly engaged in defending the Semites of old, or rather in defending their part in Assyrian civilization. On the other hand, we learn that M. OPPERT, with all other specialists in "Assyriology," accepts both the facts and the conclusions of Mr. SAYCE. That Mr. OLIPHANT did not take notice in a prophetic spirit of M. HALÉVY'S then unpublished objections may thus be satisfactorily explained without impugning Mr. OLIPHANT'S authority. They were not objections that seemed important to the mysterious force by which his thoughts were "projected" into his mind. If Assyriologists and inspirational force are both agreed, then it is plain that M. HALÉVY will find it difficult to secure a verdict for his own views, concerning the value of which we do not express any opinion. It is, however, perfectly certain that M. HALÉVY is not M. OPPERT, and that M. OPPERT is the ally of Mr. SAYCE, and not his adversary. Indeed, the unlucky confusion could only be caused (humanly speaking) by that association of ideas which unites opposites.

THE MORALS OF HAILEYBURY.

THE assailants and the apologists of public schools—"England's public schools," as the Head master of Haileybury magniloquently terms them—have hitherto imputed to them rather an excessive love of freedom than an undue tendency to interference. Haileybury, however, once the nursery of the men who built up the Indian Empire, seems now to be itself built upon the model of a French School. An atmosphere of suspicion prevails. Desks are searched, money is marked, everybody watches everybody else; and everybody, as GEORGE ELIOT puts it, thinks that it would be well for everybody else to reflect that the ALMIGHTY is watching him. The most zealous of all these watchers is a person called CAMPBELL, whose comprehensive functions are thus reckoned up by himself. "My chief duties, which are very "numerous, are that I have to attend the chapel and book "the lates and absentees, to go round the various form-"rooms with the Head-master's notices, to take to the Head-"master for punishment all gentlemen reported, to visit the "towns and patrol the villages and neighbourhood, to see "that the gentlemen do not break bounds or rules, and "generally to enforce and supervise the discipline of the "school." To Mr. Justice FIELD an officer thus employed appears "a sort of Proctor." It might be argued, with some plausibility, on the principles of that eminent jurist, Mr. JOHN AUSTIN, that CAMPBELL is the real Head-master of Haileybury. His modest title on the spot is "Marshal." He is certainly responsible for the long trial which came to an end on Tuesday last, since the accusation against HENRY HUTT, which the jury disbelieved, rested solely and exclusively on the assumption of his absolute infallibility.

The difference between meum and tuum is not held in such respect at Haileybury as it ought to be. HENRY HUTT, the younger plaintiff in this action, was expelled on suspicion of stealing, and the Head-master said that any jury would have convicted him. The only jury before whom the case has come acquitted him; the issue being, in that respect, as Mr. Justice FIELD explained, precisely the same as if the boy had been in the dock. Other boys have been expelled both before and since on the same charge, and, it must be hoped, on more adequate grounds. That thefts were committed, and committed by some person or persons having access to the premises, there can be no doubt. The authorities seem to have jumped at the conclusion that boys must have been the culprits. As regards that general hypothesis, it would be improper to say more than that the offence is a very rare one among schoolboys and a very common one among servants. Schoolboy morality is not abnormally or impracticably high. But the Eighth Commandment is not one of those which it erases from the tables of the law. The only evidence against HENRY HUTT which was worth a moment's consideration is that a marked half-crown was found in his desk. The coin was marked and discovered by CAMPBELL, the school Marshal. The bedmaker was present when the desk was opened, and it is right to say that no imputation whatever has been made upon CAMPBELL. But the power placed in this man's hands is enormous. He has held it for eleven years, and is now only thirty-one. According to the methods of procedure adopted at Haileybury, and the rules of evidence as understood in that institution, the character of every boy is virtually at his disposal. That he should have been guilty of no flagrant abuse is very much to his own credit, and he certainly came well out of Sir CHARLES RUSSELL'S searching cross-examination. But that a man in his position should be entrusted with such tremendous opportunities of mischief is a most singular and sinister circumstance. To do CAMPBELL justice, however, his ideas of proof, as distinguished from suspicion, are quite on a level with those entertained by his employers. No sooner was the marked coin detected (it has since mysteriously disappeared) than HUTT'S guilt was treated as a matter of course. The Head-master was unfavourably impressed by the fact that the boy was at once ready with a stout denial. If HUTT had been at once prepared with a bland admission, Mr. ROBERTSON would perhaps have been disposed to take a more favourable view of his case. HUTT'S refusal to confess seems to have irritated his pastors and masters even more than the crime of which they supposed him to be guilty.

The strange behaviour of Mr. ROBERTSON and Mr. FENNING is difficult to contemplate without an almost audible smile. Mr. FENNING is the master in whose house HUTT boarded, and he wrote to HUTT'S brother, "I am very, very sorry "to say that your brother has been caught stealing." It was right for Mr. FENNING to be sorry to say this. But it was wrong of him to say it, for it was not true. Mr. FENNING had no earthly business to assume that HUTT put the marked half-crown into his desk. If "caught "stealing" means anything, it means caught in the act, and a professional teacher ought to have some acquaintance with the significance of words. But HUTT had "been to Hertford," and that was most suspicious. It is true that he had asked leave, and thereby given public notice of his intention. But "going to Hertford" has acquired at Haileybury a secondary meaning almost as definite as "going to Canossa" bears at Berlin. Indeed, if innocence wishes to escape calumny at Haileybury it should avoid Hertford as it would the Devil. Mr. FENNING having failed to make HUTT confess, HUTT was locked up in the infirmary, in the hope that solitude would soften his heart. Meanwhile his brother was sent for, and had an interview with him. Now Mr. CHARLES HUTT may be very admirable in all the other relations of life. But as a brother he leaves something to be desired. HENRY protested his innocence to CHARLES in the most solemn manner, yet CHARLES would not believe him, and informed Mr. FENNING that his brother was a "first-class young liar." The foundation for this amiable, if slightly vulgar indictment is that HENRY HUTT once said he had seen "scores of snipe," when in reality he had only seen two and a half brace. As nobody was at all likely to believe the original statement, the indication of a deceptive purpose is somewhat incomplete. Mr. FENNING, in conversation with CHARLES HUTT, illustrated the judicial impartiality of his mind by the following ejaculations:—"The only thing to bring him "to his senses is a sickness almost unto death, or a broken "limb, or a thrashing within an inch of his life by a con-"fidential friend. Have you such a friend at home? "Have you an old servant?" It is gratifying to know that by this time HENRY HUTT, with the assistance of a judge and jury, has done something towards bringing Mr. FENNING to his senses.

The findings of the jury were somewhat numerous, and Mr. Justice FIELD declined to give judgment upon them without further argument. The most important of them is, that HUTT did not steal the money which was found in his box. It follows, of course, that the libels and slanders are not true. The jury, however, have taken a very merciful view of the conduct of the authorities, holding that not only did Mr. ROBERTSON and Mr. FENNING honestly believe in HUTT'S guilt, which nobody doubts they did, but that they had reasonable grounds for their belief and for the slander uttered by Mr. ROBERTSON in conversation with his predecessor, Dr. BRADBY. The breach of contract to educate his son, which Mr. HUTT, the boy's father, alleges against the Governors, is a more doubtful point, for Sir CHARLES RUSSELL contends that only the actual commission of an offence, and not merely suspicion of it, however strong, would terminate the agreement. That is a question of very great interest, which has, so far as the researches of counsel extend, never been authoritatively settled. HENRY HUTT himself has been completely vindicated from a charge which should never have been brought against him. He has not, from first to last, wavered in his denial of the charge, and if he had been considerately asked for an explanation, instead of being hastily charged with felony, a painful exposure, implicating many people, might have been avoided. He was not the least shaken by Sir HENRY JAMES, and the extraordinary remark attributed to him by the Marshal he altogether repudiated. According to this worthy, HUTT had said to him, while they were going to the railway station, "I don't care a blow. I shall go to a coach "for two years, and then to the University, and be a "parson." It cannot be denied that there is something delightfully natural about these simple, artless words, and that it would have taken a very clever Marshal to invent them. CAMPBELL, however, must have conducted a good many boys to the railway station in his time, and it is possible that he may have mixed up their respective observations. The Governing Body of Haileybury would do well to avoid the danger of fresh scandals, which cannot be good for their school, by curtailing the functions of Mr. CAMPBELL, as well as by introducing into their educational system a little more manliness and common sense.

MR. STANLEY'S EXPEDITION.

THE stories of disasters to the relief expedition under Mr. STANLEY'S command are, even after the latest reports, entitled to a limited degree of credit. Much the same sort of things have been said about every explorer. The case of LIVINGSTONE will occur to everybody's mind. Deserters from among his followers also found their way back with reports of his death so credible on the face of them, and so circumstantial, that they were very widely accepted. Yet they turned out to be the mere lies of runaways. If what may be found to be similar legends are accepted now in spite of experience, one reason may be a predisposition to think it probable that the unhappy Egyptian business must needs be disastrous to the end. Also it is a matter of experience that the common fate of African travellers is to return to Africa once too often. If Mr. STANLEY comes to a violent end in his effort to reach EMIN PASHA, he will go the same road as many of his predecessors, and such a finish to his efforts will make our history in the Soudan perfectly consistent. But our disposition to expect evil is happily no proof that misfortune has really happened. As yet there is only probability and the untrustworthy rumours of the natives to show that matters have been going badly. It is still open to everybody to believe that the relief expedition is advancing steadily, or that, if it is stopped, it is only because the rainy season has made travelling impossible.

Although, however, there is still ground for confidence, there can naturally be no certainty. The difficulties which Mr. STANLEY has to encounter are very considerable, and their magnitude has never been quite realized at home, except by a very few. Mr. ALLEN, of the British and Foreign Anti-Slavery Society, who has written to the Times with the object of proving that recent unfavourable rumours must be unfounded, has, probably unwittingly, given a great many good reasons why the expedition should not succeed. He argues that the impassable nature of the country accounts sufficiently for Mr. STANLEY'S long silence. A quotation from one of EMIN PASHA'S letters describes them in a very forcible fashion:—"Even Mr. STANLEY "will probably find that the difficulties of the Congo "route are almost insurmountable, especially those of "transport. I know the almost impassable swamps, the "numbers of rivers with floating vegetation from personal "observation, and I know well enough the difficulty which "a traveller will have to surmount in marching from "the Congo here." In a diary which has been recently published, EMIN PASHA speaks of a morass in which "the water between each single thicket reached up to our "necks, and the roots caught our feet like nooses." Obviously it is difficult to send messages in such a country, and Mr. STANLEY may have been compelled to break his promise of sending information to Major BARTTELOT. He will have had need of all his men as porters. But it is equally obvious that in such a country the expedition may have been overwhelmed by water or prostrated by fevers. The more we heard of impassable swamps, rivers with floating vegetation, large districts of country in which provisions could only be obtained with difficulty, as accounting for the want of information, the more possible did it appear that STANLEY and his following had been overpowered by merely natural obstacles. They had to carry with them an immense quantity of stores and ammunition for their own use, in addition to what they were carrying for the relief of EMIN PASHA. To drag all this through swamps and morasses, over rivers and hills, is a very serious undertaking, and it was always possible that the progress made was so slow that the stores became exhausted, and the porters withered away by accident, or disease, or desertion, before Mr. STANLEY could be near his destination. Neither is it quite safe to dismiss the danger of attacks from the so-called Arabs as insignificant. It is true that Mr. STANLEY has repeating-rifles and a Maxim gun, and he is the man to use them with spirit. With a fair field and even moderate support from the members of his caravan, he would make very short work of a mob of slave-hunters. But repeating-rifles and Maxim guns, like less efficient weapons, are liable to be spoilt and lost in swamps and morasses. Moreover, it is by no means certain that Mr. STANLEY would be well supported by his black followers. He described them himself as men who would fight if they could not help it, and one of the reasons he gave for preferring the Congo route to the overland road from Zanzibar was that his men would be less able to run away. Followers of this character are not to be relied upon if they have to fight seriously in addition to doing the regular heavy work of the expedition. It is well known that the slave-hunters have become much bolder since we have allowed our influence to be weakened on the coast. They have attacked the English missions in the Lake country, and there is no reason to suppose that anything but fear would deter them from falling on Mr. STANLEY if they saw a chance. TIPPOO TIB, with whom Mr. STANLEY has been constrained to form a species of alliance, was a notorious leader of these kidnappers. It does not seem to be doubted that he would attack the relief expedition if he saw the slightest chance of doing it with effect. When it is remembered that at a real crisis only a small part of the expedition would be really trustworthy, it appears by no means impossible that the slave-hunters may have made a successful onslaught by surprise, with the help very possibly of some of Mr. STANLEY'S own men of the stamp of the deserters who have already run away from him. TIPPOO TIB'S motives for attacking the expedition are amply sufficient. Just before Mr. STANLEY appeared, TIPPOO was making a series of apparently successful attacks on the trading stations of the Congo State. The expedition put a stop to his hostilities. As long as Mr. STANLEY is anywhere in the Congo country with unbroken forces TIPPOO TIB must keep comparatively quiet. It is therefore his interest to ruin the expedition if he possibly can. TIPPOO is probably far too sensible to come in the way of the Maxim and repeating-rifles; but he may find other ways of destroying the expedition more effectual than open attack, and the last story from Leopoldville, though only supported by the word of deserters, affords at least some reason for thinking that the slave-hunters may have found their opportunity.

CRITICS AT WORK.

BETWEEN time and fashion critics of music and art are apt to suffer. They must shift and pose a bit, and face this way and that in the furtive way of compromise. If they are adepts, they show how graceful a thing it is to undulate with the undulating tide, as SHELLEY sweetly sings. But this facility is not the badge of all their tribe, as is shown by the Wagnerian critic on Wagnerian opera. Time was when the mere supposition of a Wagnerian opera on the Italian stage was scouted as little less than sacrilege. Now it is regarded as a solemn function, a pretext for much incense-burning, to composer and artists alike. The revival of Lohengrin at Covent Garden last Saturday is said by the Times' critic to be "the high-water mark of the "Italian season," and this distinction is achieved by a company of great singers under an Italian conductor, as in the old days of opera, not—strange to say—by vocalists of the German school of declamation, thoroughly inured to the rigours of Wagnerian demands. There is something of backsliding here? What has become of the impassable gulf between opera and music-drama? There was a time—and a roaring time it was—when the unregenerate WAGNER—he of Paris and Dresden—who wrote operas, was very subtly distinguished from the Master of Bayreuth and his works. Rienzi then was commonly regarded as an amateurish effort in the bad old direction of opera. It was worse than amateurish; it was Meyerbeerish—a term of infinite infamy with the devout. The early operas of WAGNER were nothing, in fact, but operas. Admiration of them was looked upon as the natural, though erring, yearning after the flesh-pots which afflicts the weaker vessels among the musical. With the stern, unbending Wagnerite it was no sign of grace to care for the Fliegende Holländer or Lohengrin, save, of course, as it might be taken as prognosticating a better state. The "Master" was not proclaimed in these works. They were mere operas—GLUCK, MOZART, BEETHOVEN, wrote such —but the "music-drama" of WAGNER, disdainful of the vulgar appellation, was the one true test of the elect. You must stand or fall by the colossal tetralogy. You must enter the temple by the Nibelungs' Ring—that was the fiat of the propaganda. There was no other way than this.

These are tedious platitudes, the mustiness of which is already a reproach to the O.P., or old opera party, as well as to the Bayreuth sect. The admirable rendering of Lohengrin at Covent Garden was indeed well calculated to make followers of WAGNER forget the choicest dogma of their old hard creed. It was not possible to express anything but warm commendation of Mme. ALBANI and the MM. DE RESZKÉ, though it was a little cruel to sentence M. JEAN DE RESZKÉ, for a fancied breach of Wagnerian (?) etiquette, to the excruciating task of reading WAGNER'S correspondence. The Times' critic doubts if "operatic "singers read books." There is evidence at hand that they do. Some have even possessed libraries, and some have set critics on the right road of criticism. This much is, or should be, matter of history. The common penance incurred by singers who frequently attempt WAGNER might well be deemed sufficiently serious, without the extreme penalty— the "piano forte and dire," as THEODORE HOOK has it— recommended by the Times. Why should not M. DE RESZKÉ have been "carried away" by the music when he made that vulgar hazard and harangued the gods, just as the late Mme. TITIENS was "somehow carried away" in the part of ORTRUD, though she detested WAGNER? That ravishment of the incomparable LEONORA of BEETHOVEN will, by the way, exercise with misgivings those who knew, as well as those who remember, Mme. TITIENS. Like other geniuses, that illustrious artist was not averse from daring and impossible adventures. She loved to play the incredible at times, in loco. But that she failed to measure the true value of that showy declamatory part, or that she could have swallowed WAGNER'S skimble-skamble about ORTRUD being the "political woman," is much more than any one but the simple Wagnerite can believe.

The music critic has, at least, an artistic conscience. He candidly confesses that WAGNER'S contralto or mezzo-soprano parts are "almost" beyond human capacity. He may yet complete his departure from untenable theories, seeing that he has the equipment of a critic, and a genuine feeling for art. The dramatic critic who thinks it is possible to make a bad play praiseworthy by a few strokes of the pen is quite another person. The Royalty stage version of HAWTHORNE'S Scarlet Letter was one of those outrages on sensibility and imagination that are less frequent perhaps than they once were in the theatre. It is satisfactory to know that it did not receive universal acclamation. The mistake of the adaptors, according to the Times, is to be sought in the "happy ending" of the drama. Do away with this—the one happy thing in the play—and misrepresent HAWTHORNE a little less, and tout va bien. The crude prescription is taken, and it is hoped the public are taken too. But there is a delightful rider to the recommendation. HAWTHORNE'S dull environment wants "comic relief." Let us only have the "humorous aspects of Puritanism" and all will be well. At present the drama lacks those comic Puritans, and until they appear no man can say whether or not HAWTHORNE'S romance has been fitly dramatized.

MR. DILLON.

THE confirmation of Mr. DILLON'S sentence of six months' imprisonment by the Court of Quarter Sessions at Dundalk will be a matter of satisfaction to all those who do not share that profound "respect for persons" which has now become habitual with Gladstonians from the highest to the lowest. Mr. DILLON has been a long time—longer a great deal than his chief rival in the work of agitation—in bringing himself within the penalties of the Crimes Act. But, among the scores and hundreds of obscurer persons who have found their way into prison before Mr. DILLON got there, and some of whom perhaps will remain there after he comes out, there are probably more who have to thank Mr. DILLON's ingenuity and eloquence for their present sufferings than there are who stand similarly indebted to any one of his political associates, not even excepting Mr. O'BRIEN. The Plan of Campaign, if it be not the original invention of the member for East Mayo, at any rate owes to him such success as it has obtained. It was he who at the commencement of the anti-rent movement played the most active part in imbuing the minds of the Irish tenantry with those immoral doctrines which have just come under the condemnation of the Holy See. And though in the later stages of the campaign he withdrew himself somewhat from his original position of prominence, the evil which he did undoubtedly lived after him in Ireland, and his incitements have borne fruit in many an act of fraud and violence, and latterly in the infliction of many a term of imprisonment on wretched dupes who but for him would now be sitting quietly and comfortably in their own homes. We are old-fashioned enough to think that the man who is responsible for this deserves a severer punishment than his less-favoured victim; and we find no reason whatsoever for any revision of that opinion in the fact that this particular offender has succeeded in posing before his sentimental countrymen with no discernible claims as a patriot of a peculiarly romantic type, and even earning the disgusting adulation of men like Sir WILLIAM HARCOURT, and, we are sorry to add, Sir GEORGE TREVELYAN, who but a few years ago was playing the part of GESSLER to this pinchbeck TELL.

What the STUARTS and ROWNTREES and ELLISES and other conventions of political noodles may choose to say about Mr. DILLON and his wrongs is a matter of much less importance, and the address of sympathy which they presented to him on the confirmation of his sentence is only worth noticing for the sake of the naïveté with which its signatories have "given themselves away." Mr. DILLON's treatment, they tell him, is "an old story in the relations "between England and Ireland; but never before have "Englishmen been aware of it, or so ashamed of it, or so "keenly alive to the meanness of visiting all the punish- "ment springing from misgovernment upon your people "and their leaders." The "punishment arising from mis- "government" is, though an impressive, a slightly vague, expression; but the general truth of the proposition in which it occurs is as impossible to dispute as is the admirable candour of those who have enunciated it. It is undoubtedly the fact that "never before" have Englishmen, or these particular Englishmen, "been aware of," or seemed to be aware of, the enormity of punishing the instigators of crime and disorder in Ireland by imprisonment. "Never "before," it is quite true, "were they so ashamed of it, or "so keenly alive to its meanness"—that is to say, never were they all those things before Mr. GLADSTONE conceived the idea that it was better to buy the Irish leaders with appropriate legislative bribes than to imprison them. It is a precisely accurate and a most honourably frank account of the matter. We hope their candour will be equally great if ever, by some unexpected turn of the political wheel, Mr. GLADSTONE should again find it necessary to "persecute" Irish patriots, and the STUARTS and ROWNTREES and ELLISES should again be found, as beyond all doubt they would be found, marching obediently in the rear. However, that interesting time, if it is ever to come, is not yet; and meanwhile they will doubtless give Mr. GLADSTONE their active support in the attack on the Government which he is apparently threatening to base on Mr. DILLON's conviction and imprisonment—a judgment as just and a sentence as richly deserved as any that have been pronounced in Ireland, though, as the appeal was heard before one of a class of judges whom Sir WILLIAM HARCOURT has compared to SCROGGS and JEFFREYS, it will be interesting to hear his Parliamentary criticism of the case.

THE NEWSPAPER LIBEL BILL.

THE Libel Law Amendment Bill has been considered as reported, and now stands for the third reading, which it will, no doubt, pass unopposed. The last considerable defect in it was removed on Wednesday afternoon, the fifth clause being struck out by a handsome majority. The reasons why its omission was a necessary condition to the passing of the Bill have more than once been explained in detail in these columns. The clause introduced on the report by Sir ALGERNON BORTHWICK enabling a judge to consolidate actions against different defendants for substantially the same libel may sometimes delay the vindication of a libelled plaintiff's character; but plaintiffs who can afford to bring several actions at once can usually also afford a certain amount of interlocutory skirmishing. The clause is only an enabling one, and while it may often be useful in saving costs, it is hardly possible that it can do any real injustice. Mr. SMITH's new clause about indicting for blasphemous or obscene libels was proposed with good intentions, but has nothing to do with the subject of the Bill. Moreover, people who do not understand indictments would do well to be careful how they interfere with them, so that the House of Lords may not improbably simplify the measure by taking the clause out. There is really hardly anything else which the circumstances of the case imperatively demand that they should do, though the addition made to Clause 4, on the motion of Mr. LAWSON, may also deserve careful consideration.

The result will be that in all points of wide importance the law will stand nearly as it does at present. With respect to reporting public meetings the existing enactment will be infinitesimally strengthened by the requirement that, in order to be privileged, the defamatory matter must not only be such that its publication was for the public benefit, but also "of public interest"—whatever that may be decided to mean. On the other hand, reports of meetings of inferior public bodies will be privileged by statute to a reasonable extent. The most important clause in the Bill is that which permits the recovery of damages for the same libel published elsewhere to be given in evidence as mitigation of damages. It is not very important, and it is, on the whole, unobjectionable. Altogether, the House of Commons may be congratulated upon having performed its duties in respect of this Bill considerably better than it usually does. Its conduct justifies to the full every one of the expressions of hostility to the Bill published before and during its consideration in Committee by the House of Commons.

THE MEETING AT THE FOREIGN OFFICE.

WE are glad that the step taken by the PRIME MINISTER since the last Ministerial reverse has effectually discouraged the unwise and insincere attempts which have been made in some quarters to minimize the importance of the mishap. Whatever amount of authenticity may attach to the reports of last Thursday's proceedings at the Foreign Office—and they have every appearance of being authentic—it would hardly be maintained, we presume, even by Lord SALISBURY himself, that the object of the meeting either was or was intended to be a secret. It was almost avowedly called to consider the present position and future action of the party as affected by the recent Ministerial reverses in the House of Commons; and, in the face of this fact, it would be absurd to pretend any longer that the defeat of the Government on Mr. JOHN MORLEY's amendment last Tuesday night was a light matter. The "responsi- "bilities" in connexion with that defeat have been dealt with elsewhere, and we have not hesitated to lay the chief blame on what we consider the right shoulders. We regard the maladroit Parliamentary tactics as mainly answerable for the mishap. We agree with those speakers at the meeting who complained—if they are correctly reported—that Mr. RITCHIE did not reply to Mr. MORLEY when he moved the amendment on Tuesday which was carried against the Government; and if Mr. RITCHIE replied, as he is stated to have done, by justifying his action, and declaring "that he had fully informed the party," he made, in our judgment, a very inadequate defence. We have already given our opinion that "full information" to the party, under all the circumstances of the case, was not, and could not be, conveyed by the curt statement, without note or comment, that the Government could not assent to Mr. MORLEY's proposal.

This said, however, it still remains to address a word or two to the rank-and-file. Assuming the account of their demeanour and utterances at the Foreign Office meeting to be fairly accurate—and it bears all the stamp of probability—it has become time to ask some of these gentlemen whether they have fully considered the consequences to which their present line of action in the House of Commons is obviously tending. The members of the "left wing," as Lord SALISBURY is reported to have styled them, appear to take a view of their minor Parliamentary pledges which will sooner or later bring these obligations, such as they are, into dread conflict with the much more important purpose for which the Unionists, Liberal or Conservative, have been returned to Parliament. When we find some of these Ministerial stragglers professing themselves unable to support this or that provision in a measure because they are embarrassed by their promises to their constituents, we have to remind them of certain other promises of considerably greater concern which they seem to have forgotten. It appears to be thought by the Conservative of the "enlightened" type, as the cant phrase runs, that any local fad to which he may have committed himself for the purpose of securing his election has thenceforth a sacred and supreme claim upon his allegiance, and that the much more important pledges of general support to a Government who were placed in power to maintain the Union may be remitted to the second place. What, for instance, are we to think of a Conservative who calls upon the Government to adhere to their Sunday-closing clause, which was a proposal strictly conditioned by the acceptance of its associated provisions now abandoned, and declares that, if they do not, he will be compelled to vote against them on the strength of engagements entered into with the teetotal fanatic who helped him to his seat? Surely such gentlemen should be reminded, and reminded sharply, that they were not sent to the House of Commons to prosecute the crotchets of a knot of Pharisaical busybodies who happen to have voted for him at the last election, but to maintain the integrity of the Empire, and to keep permanently out of power the most mischievous and profligate politician who has ever attempted to mount to power upon the ruin of his country. If the pettiest form of parochialism has acquired such control over the Conservative rank and file, it is all the more necessary for their commander to recall them to a worthier conception of the cause for which they are fighting.

FOLLY OR FUNK?

We have certainly no wish to encourage by any remarks of our own the exaggerated fuss which it suits the Gladstonians to make about the recent defeat of the Government. Much indulgence may be shown for a party whom the utter blankness of their political future has driven well-nigh to despair, and they ought in charity to be allowed the luxury of making believe that every Ministerial miscarriage, small or great, is full of fatal portent for the Unionist cause. But though the Opposition may be permitted without much protest to enjoy these topics of illusory consolation, it is straining benevolence a little for a Government to go out of its way to provide them. Blunders are blunders whether their meaning and consequence be exaggerated or not, and it is the duty of Governments to transact their business without blundering. To slip and stumble continually in the conduct of a legislative measure may have no immediately evil effect on their Parliamentary position; but it cannot be expected to prepossess the country in their favour as administrators. As regards the particular measure now in question—the Local Government Bill—it has become specially incumbent upon Ministers to show skill and vigilance of Parliamentary pilotage. We have already admitted the substantial soundness of their decision in the matter of the licensing clauses. They are well quit of these proposals, and, however opinions may vary as to the policy of their original introduction, there can be no reasonable dispute as to the justification for withdrawing them. That the licensing question should be dealt with in a Local Government Bill may be a matter of legislative convenience, but the association of the two is demanded by no necessity, either logical or practical; and to have adhered to the plan of associating them in disregard of the mischievous party manœuvres for which that plan was affording opportunity would have been eminently unwise. It is quite natural that Mr. GLADSTONE should be willing to ally himself with teetotal fanatics, as he has already allied himself with much worse men, and to plunder publicans, as he has already plundered landlords, in the effort to regain a position from which he may once more attempt the dismemberment of the Empire; and it is not surprising that the first chance of adopting those tactics should be eagerly seized upon by him. But it was unfortunate that the Government should have made him a present of that chance, and it would have been the merest Quixotism to have continued to press it on his acceptance.

Still, it is never desirable that a Government should find themselves obliged to make important changes in a measure, either by way of addition or retrenchment, during its passage through the House of Commons; and since this course has been forced upon Ministers they were bound to display an even greater degree of firmness and circumspection in the subsequent conduct of the Bill than would otherwise have been required of them. All the more, therefore, to be regretted is it that they should have handled the seventh clause of the Local Government Bill with such weakness or such negligence, or, as seems the most probable account of all, such subservience to so-called "popular demands" as to have had an amendment to which they thought it at least worth while to offer opposition forced upon them by an adverse majority. It cannot be said that the mischance of last Tuesday night was one for which they had any excuse for being unprepared. On the contrary, the whole course of the discussion of the seventh clause from Friday night onward ought to have warned them, and must have warned them, that the Gladstonian Opposition—whose whole conduct on this question seems to derive its plenary inspiration from the genius of Mr. CONYBEARE and Mr. CUNNINGHAME GRAHAM—would spare no effort to deprive the county magistracy of the last remains of their authority over the police. The division on the ill-judged amendment of Mr. HENEAGE—whose speech appears to us to be a complete argument for the exactly opposite course to that which he pursued—was a sufficient notice to the Government that if they valued their own proposed settlement of the police question at all, they would have to guard it, not only against the attacks of open enemies, but also against the neglect of lukewarm friends. They could not have missed the significance of the fact that Mr. HENEAGE's proposal to hand over to the County Councils "the appointment, control, and dismissal "of Chief Constables and the management of the police" was lost by only forty-six votes, and they were not long in having proof that the advocates of "popular" management for the police had been encouraged by the comparative closeness of the division. It was at any rate clear that, though they could not get all they wanted in the direction of Mr. HENEAGE's amendment, they were thoroughly bent on getting all that they could. On the following Monday night an endeavour was made, and ruled by Mr. COURTNEY to the surprise of many to be regular, to procure a rehearing for one of the two branches of Mr. HENEAGE's rejected proposal. Mr. BRUNNER, however, ultimately withdrew his amendment in favour of vesting the appointment of the Chief Constable in the hands of the County Councils. Mr. STANSFELD then made an attempt to give the County Councils the determination of the Chief Constable's salary, a proposal which Mr. RITCHIE resisted on the thoroughly reasonable ground that if the Justices were to retain the appointment of this officer they should also fix the rate of his remuneration. Here again, however, the adverse amendment was only carried by forty-one votes, and the Government were, therefore, again advertised of the existence of an important section among their followers who, in their desire to curtail magisterial authority, were prepared to sever these two obviously associated functions of appointment and payment. Their vote, at any rate, indicated a desire to prejudice the issue to be shortly raised on the Government's own proposal, since it is pretty obvious that if the House had been induced to decide that the County Councils should fix the Chief Constable's salary, they could not have brought a perfectly unbiassed mind to bear on the question whether the Justices should appoint him. Yet with all these warnings of what might be expected of their party when this question came on for decision, the Government moved neither hand nor foot on the following night to influence their vote. On reaching the substantive proposal that the Justices should appoint the Chief Constable, Mr. MORLEY simply moved, without a speech, the omission of the words conferring this power. Mr. RITCHIE signified, also without a speech, that the Government could not consent to the amendment. No other Minister said a word good, bad, or indifferent; and on the House dividing, Mr. MORLEY carried his point by a majority of 30.

We have pronounced it impossible to suppose that Ministers were unaware of the danger to which their clause stood exposed. They must have known from all that passed that a serious appeal to their followers had become absolutely necessary if their proposal was to maintain its place in the Bill; and the inference which their enemies will draw from it is that they rode for a fall. Mr. Ritchie on the previous night had spoken of the arrangement with regard to the Chief Constable in a thoroughly half-hearted way, and it is difficult to believe that the Government really cared much about its retention. But why, then, oppose and divide against Mr. Morley's amendment? Did Ministers or did they not believe that it was important to keep the appointment of Chief Constables in the hands of Quarter Sessions, and that there were serious objections to allowing the privilege to pass into the hands of the joint Committee of Justices and County Councillors who are to have the general management of the police? If they did think it important to uphold their own plan in this matter, why did they not call upon their followers to support it? If they did not think so, why did they resist its modification? If, as has been suggested, they personally preferred their own proposal to Mr. Morley's, but did not think it "made much difference one way or the other," why did not they tell their party in so many words that they regarded the question as an open one, and so save heart-searchings to some anxious Ministerialists in either lobby? For our own part we are inclined to believe that the question at issue was not an unimportant one, and to fear that the Government did not themselves think it was. It seems to us extremely probable that control of the police by a joint committee of County Councillors and Justices will turn out in practice to be much the same thing as control by the County Council alone; and in that case the privilege of which the Justices have been deprived, and which Mr. Morley, true to his French revolutionary models, has just succeeded in transferring to an elective body, would have been the only protection against the police passing completely into the hands of County Councillors of the Conybeare and Cunninghame Graham complexion. And, as we have said, we too much fear that the Government saw this also, but in their desire to conciliate their "democratic" wing, who want the whip rather than the sop, they ran away from their own proposals.

MARTENS, EAGLES, AND OWLS.

FOR the tourist the sight of one of the Alpine birds or beasts of prey almost always adds to the charm of the scene. If he can catch a glimpse of a marten, one of the most graceful as well as beautiful of the wild quadrupeds of Europe, as it courses beneath a bank or darts to its retreat, he feels that his walk has not been taken in vain. The familiar fox is greeted with something like the feelings with which we welcome an old friend to a new home, and even the smaller robbers all seem to be in their right place in the breezy sunny landscape. But the birds are an even greater and more constant delight. One of the larger hawks circling overhead, or, if one has had a hard climb, beneath one's feet, seems the rightful proprietor of the fir-woods among which one stands or which one has left behind. Still more, when one is standing in the recesses of the rocks at the head of a mountain torrent, with nothing but precipitous grey cliffs around, and a huge raven comes hovering past or an eagle hangs apparently motionless on outspread wings in the middle of the sky, do we realize our perfect solitude, and feel that the peaks and precipices belong to them rather than mankind; and if, on our return, we hear a forester boasting of his success in slaughtering these lords of the wilderness, we are apt to feel something like indignation as well as regret.

To a forester, who looks upon the game of the district almost as his own flocks and herds, it is natural that the matter should seem different. During the whole winter he has fed the roes at a considerable expense, he has perhaps postponed the felling of a part of the wood because he knows that it contains the nest of a black cock or an auerhahn, and he is by no means inclined to look quietly on while the beasts of the field and the fowls of the air fatten on the harvest of his exertions. The marten is a gourmand. In the early spring he lives chiefly upon eggs, later on he preys upon leverets, unfledged birds and weak young creatures of every kind. He is far too dainty to touch the flesh of his victim at this season; he simply drinks the blood while it is still warm and goes his way. He has no objection to treat a domestic fowl in a similar manner if he can get into a hen-house and does not find enough fresh eggs to gorge his voracious appetite. In winter he attacks even larger game. Nothing is more helpless than a roe after a heavy snowfall; at every step his hoofs break the thin crust of ice, and so he has to wade through the solid mass. Hour by hour the marten glides over the surface of the snow beside or close behind him, till the hunted creature is fairly exhausted; then its pursuer springs upon its neck, bites the jugular vein, and sucks out its very life. In winter foxes hunt in a similar way, but they break the spinal cord and eat at least a part of the flesh instead of drinking the blood of their victims. If times are hard, they bury the rest of the carcass, but they greatly prefer fresh meat.

For the birds of prey it may at least be urged that they do act as natural scavengers. This year in many parts of the Austrian Alps the avalanches broke new paths for themselves, carrying down a large quantity of well-grown forest trees, and overwhelming whole herds of chamois and deer. When the masses of snow began to melt in the more lonely valleys ravens and birds of similar tastes might almost always be seen hovering above them. They were waiting for the dead bodies to come to light in order that they might devour them. But nature does not always supply so harmless, though repulsive, a meal; and when it is wanting poaching begins. It is especially during the breeding season that their depredations are serious, for then their families have to be provided for, and there are many helpless young animals about. Thus the remains of eight young roes, twelve chamois kids, and several lambs, were found beside an eyrie which contained two unfledged eagles in Carinthia, 1887.

The destruction of these wild birds and beasts is, therefore, one of the chief duties of a forester if a carefully preserved estate is committed to his care. Both poison and traps are well known, but the elder generation regard them, particularly the former, with dislike. They seem to think that they are taking an unfair advantage of a brother sportsman by employing such underhand means of getting rid of him. The old methods are, therefore, still in full use, and they are by no means unsuccessful.

To shoot a fox seems unchivalrous, to say the least, but in a country where hunting is impossible it is perhaps the most polite way of putting an end to its existence. This is done in the following way:—A room is prepared in some old mill or outhouse that lies outside the village, and can be heated at least by an iron stove. At a convenient distance—say from thirty to sixty yards, according to the nature of the ground—carrion is from the earliest winter thrown out upon the snow. This attracts the foxes, and a watchman informs the master of the room at what hour of the night they usually appear. When the moon is near the full, he seats himself in his ambuscade about an hour before the appointed time. There must be no light, and conversation can only be carried on in a whisper. When the fox appears he seems to untrained eyes little more than a shadow on the snow, but this half sight of him is usually enough for his enemy. Should he be missed, he will not return to the same place till new snow has fallen.

The larger birds of prey are often shot in a similar manner, though when they are concerned more labour and discomfort are involved. Some small hut which lies high among the rocks and is used in summer by the herdsmen or the fellers of timber is hired, and dead animals are exposed at a convenient distance. Any one who comes down the mountain side is usually ready to let the sportsman know if the carcases have been touched, and, if such chance news should fail, he can easily satisfy himself by visiting the place. When he is convinced that the expected guests have duly put in their appearance, he leaves his home at such a time as will allow him to reach the hut an hour before dawn. Such a night excursion over the frozen snow requires considerable local knowledge and some skill in mountaineering, and when the destination is reached it is by no means a palace of delight. The huts can rarely be heated in any way, and, if they could, it would be of little use as the sportsman must sit with his window open. A raven or an eagle will be frightened away by the mere opening of a casement to which, if it be done quietly, the fox pays no attention. All is now perfectly still around, and the stars are the only lights that are to be seen. At last a grey streak appears in the east, and soon afterwards a dark mass hovers or pounces down on the feast that has been treacherously spread for him. The light is still too dim to admit of a certain aim; but, if the sportsman is young and keen, he will probably try his luck. Should the bird fall he lets it lie quietly, in order not to awaken the suspicion of newcomers. In this way three or four large birds may occasionally be bagged in a single morning. In the evening twilight a shot may occasionally be obtained, but this is comparatively rare.

Of spring mornings a more original form of sport is practised. It would be interesting to know why all birds of prey bear a personal enmity to the horned owl; but the question is one that we cannot pretend to answer. The fact, however, is beyond question, and it is one of which gamekeepers and others make full use. A bird of this kind is caught or reared. He does not make a very amusing pet; but it is not his mission in life to be amiable—that is the very last thing his master expects or wishes from him, if he were to get really tame he would be useless. He learns to know the man who feeds him, and to regard him with a little more tolerance than other members of the human family; but even his keeper must handle him with the greatest caution, as his beak and talons are formidable weapons, and he has no scruple whatever about using them. Most foresters in the higher Austrian Alps have an owl of this kind, or at least know there is one in the neighbourhood which they can borrow on occasion.

When you have an owl, the next thing is to determine the scene of your exploits. An exposed upland meadow bordered by woods is the best. Here a kind of hut is built of branches lopped from the neighbouring trees, in such a way as to conceal the persons within while allowing them a free outlook in all directions. At a convenient distance, and generally somewhat above the hut, a dead and leafless bough, with a single cross branch from three to four feet above the earth, is erected. It must be stout and firmly driven into the turf; for it is to serve as a perch for your owl, which is heavy and by no means wanting in vigour. When these arrangements have been made, it is best to leave the place unvisited for two or three days.

On the day when the adventure is to be consummated the sportsman carries his gun and the keeper the owl to the hut; the latter is fastened to the stake by a light chain, which must be long enough to enable the bird to flutter from the perch to the ground, and go a yard or so in every direction. To the chain a long cord is attached, the other end of which is placed in the hut. Its purpose is to enliven the owl. If he shows signs of drowsiness a slight pull will wake him up, and a rather stronger one will induce him to flutter down from the branch or to return to it again, as the case may be. As soon as these arrangements have been completed everybody present retires to the hut, and the owl seats himself on his perch and turns his head round and round with an expression in his eyes which seems to say that he is disgusted with things in general and his own position in particular.

If the sportsman has any luck, a flight of the small mountain crows will soon circle, cawing loudly, above their feathered enemy. They have a bad name as egg-stealers; but the forester does not shoot at them, because he knows their angry cries are likely to attract larger birds, and they themselves rarely venture to attack the owl. If they do, it simply raises all its feathers, which make it look twice its real size and are a sufficient protection. When threatened by more powerful enemies, it flutters down and throws itself on its back; in this position it is a match for all but the very largest birds of prey. It rarely comes to this, however, since as soon as a hawk or raven is fairly within shot it is usually brought down or else frightened away by the discharge of the gun.

This sport may be practised with success at almost any hour except full noon, but the dawn is considered the best time; and such an excursion to one of the huts has many charms besides those that depend upon the slaughter of birds which, however hateful they may be to the gamekeeper, the lonely wanderer can hardly help regarding as his comrades. The sharp night walk through the light mountain air, the gradual awakening of nature, the scent of the fir-trees are all enjoyments in themselves; and it may be added that they tend to sharpen your appetite for the excellent, though simple, lunch which your host, if he be a true sportsman, will certainly have provided.

SORRY THEY SPOKE.

By all persons of sensibility the woes of Dr. Smolka, President of the Austrian Reichsrath and Delegation, must be regarded with peculiar sympathy. It is a difficult matter to say new and appropriate things on such an incident as the death of the Emperor Frederick, and the venerable President of the Austrian Reichsrath has no doubt been not alone in feeling this. But Dr. Smolka need not have complicated his difficulties by rushing into one of the thorniest places of theology, and forgetting entirely a certain chapter of Holy Writ which disclaims with the utmost energy the doctrine about "the sins of the fathers" as construed in the narrow sense. Dr. Smolka assured the world, it seems, that the sufferings of the Emperor Frederick were not the punishment for any offences of his own, but were "an expiation for the sins of his forefathers"—sins for which he was "not responsible." Now there does not appear to have been any indignation aroused by the worthy Doctor's rather questionable theology; but much by his politics. For he is a Pole, and it was imagined that this reference was to the partition of Poland, in which little matter Austria herself was not exactly unconcerned. So the press of the Austrian capital and of the Austrian Empire appears to have been indulging, less pointedly, but with equal energy, in some reflections on Poles similar to those expressed in undying verse by one Heinrich Heine. Indeed, Dr. Smolka seems to have, in vulgar phrase, "got it all round." Some Austrians were insulted at the supposed reference to the partition; others have charged him with trying by a new blunder to make up for an old one—to wit, his former reference to the Emperor William I., in which he was thought to be unpatriotically forgetful of Sadowa—and his Polish fellows upbraid him with oblivion of certain supposed tyranny of Prince Bismarck's towards the countrymen of the great Eselinski. It is to be hoped that he, like Miss Ferrier's young ladies when their younger sisters were married before them, is "Wonderfully Supported and bears up with Astonishing Firmness." But it can hardly be doubted that he is sorry he spoke.

In this not least mortifying of human conditions he has, or ought to have, certain companions nearer home. One of these is Sir Thomas Grattan Esmonde, M.P., who enjoys a certain distinction—first, as being one of the two or three "persons of quality" who have joined themselves to Mr. Parnell's tail of Yahoos; and, secondly, as sharing the name of an immortal. The unhappy Sir Thomas, strong in the belief that it is an Irish member's duty to be troublesome in questioning, and perhaps flushed with the amount of contributions from the American housemaids which he brought home the other day, has, it seems, been asking questions about the whereabouts of Her Majesty's ship Belleisle. He has thereby excited noble wrath in the breast of Mr. Davitt, who has historical reasons for not being fond of Her Majesty's forces of all kinds. Majestic are the words, sublime the warning, of the Emeritus-Professor of "penmanship." "What in the name of common sense and decency has the whereabouts of this warship to do" with Sir Thomas's duties? What has he to do with naval and military forces alternately "pressed into the service of coercion and eviction," and engaged in "the ruin of hundreds of Irish girls"? Now we had thought that all the princes of darkness combined could not ruin an Irish girl, according to the boast of her compatriots. It should be left to Tories to be anxious about the sailings and moorings of such media of misgovernment, &c. &c. Probably since that countryman of Davitt's, who talked about the "small cornuted animal," no finer description of ships than "media of misgovernment" has been devised; and the anathema of Davitt is otherwise interesting as showing the combined spirit of childish treason, of ultra-feminine disloyalty, to which our Gladstonians wish to entrust a third of the United Kingdom. But these are reflections for Unionists; Sir Thomas can only, like poor Dr. Smolka, be "sorry he spoke."

A figure equally pathetic in degree, and of a pathos not wholly different in kind, is presented by the head of the house of Bass, weeping over the "responsible leaders of the Liberal party" at the licensed victuallers' meeting of Wednesday last. Far be it from us to make any fun of Lord Burton's words in themselves. What he said about the "recorded opinions" of the leaders just referred to on the subject of property in and compensation for the loss of licences was perfectly true. The movement against the brewers' property is "confiscation of the broadest and most unscrupulous character," though not perhaps so very much broader than that against Irish landlords. The licensing question "had been brought to the front for party purposes," the leaders had been "attracted by an agitation based on misrepresentation and misstatement; an agitation which appealed to the cupidity of men." "Virtue and morality were invoked, but the real appeal was made to the pockets of the electors." It would be absolutely impossible to speak truer words be the speaker who he may. But, if we turn from the words to the speaker, and inquire a little who he is, then the twinklings of the eye of heartless merriment may accompany the curlings of the lip of brutal sarcasm. For it is this same Lord Burton who not many weeks ago (more by token a poet of our own enshrined the incident in deathless verse) assured an audience that he and they "meant to go in solid for the Grand Old Man." Alas! when he said that he meant to go in solid for the Grand Old Man, he evidently did not think that the Grand Old Man would not go in, but "go for," the liquid interest. Beer is touched, and the solidity or solidarity of Lord Burton with Gladstonianism undergoes a fatal dissolution. If Lord Burton had known how false Mr. Gladstone would have grown when he heard the bells tinkle that welcomed him (and Lord Ripon, we think) on that occasion some weeks ago, he would have done then, we trow, what he cannot help now, and have handed over the idea of solidity with so bad a man to anybody who might like to have it. But it is too late; and when anybody in the future mentions the phrase "going in solid" before Lord Burton, the very least thing that can be anticipated is that Lord Burton too will be sorry he spoke.

Indeed, the political man's life, unless he is extraordinarily adroit or extraordinarily shameless, must be to no small degree a life of being sorry he spoke. If Mr. Parnell is one of the most tactically successful of political leaders, it is precisely because he is so careful of saying anything; he writes letters, they say, sometimes. Mr. Gladstone, it is believed, never feels this peculiar sensation. Indeed, Dante would have probably placed him in a new bolgia of the Inferno; his tongue perpetually branded afresh by demons with all the words which he has spoken, and which he ought to be, but is not yet, sorry for. Sir William Harcourt (whose birthplaces, we are glad to observe, are multiplying like Mr. Gladstone's own), though he has said some awkward things in the past, now, it may be observed, avoids with considerable skill saying anything but an infinite deal of nothing; and we hardly think that when, as he doubtless will, he becomes a strong Unionist, any one will be able to discover a single decided phrase of his that may cause him inconvenience. Mr. Morley, being quite sincere, has no reason to be sorry for anything he has spoken; though a sufficient quantity of political hellebore might make him very sorry for much that he has thought. But in some of the minor stars or prophets—as, for instance, Sir George Trevelyan—the mood is very common. He cannot brazen it out like Sir William, and say that he has "refused to desert the party to which he belonged and the leader under whom he serves"—a description of desertion which would seem to show that Abdiel was a very contemptible character. During his gyrations between Unionism and Separatism not long ago, he said all sorts of things which he had almost in so many words to confess himself sorry for having spoken shortly afterwards—generally, indeed, next week—and this foolish trick abides with him still. On Wednesday Sir George confessed that Mr. Dillon's heart "perhaps burnt a little too hotly when he spoke about the injustice of arrears." Now just at this same time Sir William Harcourt, after describing Ayr as the "Scotch hegira" of Mr. Chamberlain (by the way, what is Sir William's exact notion of a hegira? we should like to see it), declared that Mr. Dillon's voice, converted in his imprisonment into a protest from Sir William himself and other pure-minded patriots, will "find an echo in every heart that is not insensible to the sentiments of honour [as evinced by not paying the rent you have agreed to pay], of humanity [as shown by boycotting and cattle-maiming], and of justice [as shown by Moonlight murders]." Now it is very hard to reconcile Sir George's admission that Mr. Dillon's heart "perhaps burnt too hotly," and Sir William's boisterous determination that every honourable man, à la Harcourt, every humane man, à la Brady and Kelly, every just man, à la Plan of Campaign, must, shall, and will make his own heart burn at exactly the heat of Mr. Dillon's. These things agree not together; and the speaker (or at least one of them) ought to be sorry he spoke—if twenty Separatists had been elected for twenty Ayrs. Nor was it wise of Sir George in the same speech to confess that Liberalism had now no official standing ground in Birmingham. Could even he, with whom malapropos speeches seem to have become a habit and almost a mania, be deaf to the sense of such a phrase? It surely must, like the energetic anathemas of the reverend gentleman mentioned by Fuller, have "left a dismal echo in his auditors' ears for a good while longer." Liberalism no standing ground in Birmingham? A coalless Newcastle? Athens destitute of owls?

Alas! why is not Praed alive to string up in musical verse a patter of impossibilities fit to go with this astonishing confession of Sir George's. Birmingham Liberals, it seems, as Sir George counts Liberalism, "have to go beyond their own bounds," have to go to Walsall and Wolverhampton, to Sir George and Sir Balthasar, to Parthians and Medes, and to Elamites and dwellers in Mesopotamia, in order to find "staunch Liberals" to lead them. The explanation of the miracle is, it seems, in this wicked Mr. Chamberlain. But that is hardly an explanation that explains. Something else must have happened, and we all know what it is to wither the Liberalism of Birmingham in a night. And if Unionist speakers were half as active as Separatist, and half as ready to catch their opponents tripping, it would not be long before the good people of Birmingham would hear this said in a manner which would make Sir George, who is not yet by any means case-hardened, distinctly conscious of the sorrowful chances of speech.

THE SELBORNE MAGAZINE.

IN these days of hurry and turmoil, when even the modest primrose is torn up by the roots to become an article of commerce in crowded cities, when primrose farms are established, and when we hear of gowns trimmed with the bodies of robins or of blackbirds, and ladies' hats surmounted by the wings of many warblers, it is refreshing to read the monthly Selborne Magazine, the organ of the Selborne Society. The Society, as many readers of the Saturday Review will remember, was formed by Mr. and Mrs. Musgrave with a view of entering a protest against the destruction of rare birds or the use of the plumage of woodland birds in dress, and for the preservation of wild plants and to promote the study of nature. The Selborne Magazine, in a very unpretentious form, gives information dear to the lovers of nature, and those who have observed interesting facts in natural history are encouraged to communicate what they have seen.

We cannot but feel that if once the public understood what irreparable injury is done by destroying wild flowers or killing the feathered songsters of our woods, they would join in a league for their protection. There is a part of the country which at this time of year is a paradise of wild flowers, which are, however, somewhat cherished by art; nevertheless, they give the effect of being wild. The banks are literally covered with blue forget-me-nots, the gardens have been brimming over with cowslips, oxlips, wallflowers, and myriads of primroses. Now the woods are dazzling with vivid yellow azaleas, flashing golden broom, scarlet and white rhododendrons, fragrant lilac, sheets of blue-bells, and the beautiful pink ragged robin and green fern. Through these woods during Whitsun week upwards of two thousand excursionists wandered; they mostly came from crowded cities, but it is said that not a single blossom or bough was touched.

These woods are frequented by many rare birds, but they have not hitherto been spared. The owls in particular have been sometimes shot, but it is hoped they will in future be protected. One of the great charms of the Selborne Magazine is that it mentions every month what wild flowers are blooming, and, in fact, teaches those who are beginning to study the book of nature where to look and what to look for, and, indeed, for what wood notes wild to listen. It is pleasant to think that even dwellers in London may easily study nature in some of the parks; and within a very short distance from London there are lanes, and woods, and commons, where the true lover of nature may enjoy a ramble. Lord Tennyson is President of the Selborne Society; and if all those who have read with rapture his descriptions of spring, summer, and autumn glories would unite in discouraging the thoughtless destruction of wild flowers, and the cruel slaughter of sea-gulls and other birds for adornment, the practices might cease, and many a rare bird dwell in our woods. If everyone who is observant, and who has opportunities of studying nature, were to note his or her experiences, most interesting facts would be gleaned. And one pleasant feature of the Selborne Magazine is that letters are admitted from correspondents who have noticed circumstances bearing on the habits of birds or the blooming of flowers. These communications often show how much pleasure may be found by observant dwellers even in parts of the country not remarkable for picturesque features, while those who live in woodland, mountainous, or lake districts find constantly fresh subjects of interest. We believe that among the poorer classes the love of nature is very strong, and that if the working people once realized that in uprooting wild flowers the great charm of our rural country is being destroyed, they would rarely yield to the temptation of taking the sweet blossoms; and it would be well to give away publications like the Selborne Magazine, as many acts of depredation are committed in ignorance.

THE MARIONETTES.

AFTER an absence of some years, the Marionettes have returned to the scene of many of their greatest triumphs; for ever since the fifteenth century these amusing puppets have been favourites with Londoners. If we are not mistaken, their last appearance of any importance was about thirty-five years ago, when a troupe of wooden actors attracted crowds to the Adelaide Gallery to witness a performance of Aladdin and the Wonderful Lamp and a "skit" on the adventures of Johanna Wagner and her manager, which were then the talk of the town. Doubtless the Italian Exhibition is mainly responsible for the appearance of no less than two companies of marionettes this season, one playing at the theatre recently opened in the gardens of that institution, and the other at Hengler's Circus. Both companies solemnly announce that they have had the honour of performing before their Italian Majesties, and are of equal merits. Unquestionably these are the right players for children, and this was the opinion of George Sand, who spent a good deal of her spare time at Nohant organizing performances of marionettes for the amusement of her grandchildren. From time immemorial these wooden comedians have held their own against players of flesh and bone, and have maintained a respectable position in the theatrical world. The ancient Egyptians were devoted to them, and even buried them decently in the coffins of their children; for relics of mechanical dolls have been frequently found in the coffins of Egyptian, Greek, Etruscan, and Roman children. At the feast of Osiris they took an important part in the pageant, and later on, when Rome was at the acme of her glory, marionettes flourished exceedingly; and among the most popular of them was the figurine of Mandacus, who is possibly the direct ancestor of Croquemitaine and Punch. After the decline of Roman grandeur, the wooden actors are lost sight of for nearly six hundred years. Possibly they were in existence, and paying their expenses right merrily; but we hear nothing of them until the middle ages have fairly set in, and then they came to the front once more—this time in religious garb, enacting scenes from the Bible, the life of Christ, and the legends of the saints. At Jerusalem the Crusaders witnessed them perform in the Passion plays; and in Spain, even as early as the Council of Orehuela, they had already become so numerous and perhaps also so irregular in their conduct, by not appearing in sacred dramas with becoming gravity, that this solemn assembly unanimously excommunicated them, and decreed their suppression. In England, even in the time of Edward II., troupes of marionettes visited the village fairs and acted, to the delight of the country folk, Miracle and Passion plays. The sixteenth century beheld a startling change in their répertoire, at least in Italy. They suddenly abandoned the sacred for the profane drama, and Sanudo tells us in his Diary that, when Lucrezia Borgia was married to Don Alfonzo d'Este, she was, among other innumerable amusements organized for her pleasure, entertained with a grand ballet, danced by dolls, which was performed before her at Bologna. Henry III. of France was a great patron of the marionettes, and so was Louis XIV., under whose reign, in 1669, the sum of 1,365 livres was paid to Jean Broché, a famous impresario of wooden actors, for eight performances by marionettes, before the Dauphin and the children of France. Anthony Hamilton, in a letter to the Princess Anne, daughter of James II., describes a marionette show at St. Germain, and quotes these lines:—

> Blanchisseuses et soubrettes,
> Du dimanche dans leurs habits
> Avec les laquays leurs amis,
> Venant de voir à juste prix
> La troupe de marionnettes,
> Pour trois sols et quelque denier
> On leur fit voir non sans machines
> L'Enlèvement de Proserpine.

In the last century the marionettes were exceedingly fashionable, and Voltaire invited a troupe of them to visit him at Cirey, where they had the honour of performing before him and his friends, affording thereby a very fine subject for a picture, which we think has yet to be painted. The English Puritans waged a cruel war against the poor puppets, and it was not until quite late in the last century that they emerged in this country from their enforced concealment and became once again the fashion. In Italy they have always been favourites with all classes, and even now there are some twenty companies of them strolling up and down the country from Milan to Naples, playing principally in Advent and Lent, for the benefit of children, plays of a religious character. Of these companies, the best are the two now in London.

We are glad to observe that our old friends the marionettes are not as yet affected by the spirit of modern progress. They appear content to remain just as they have always been; for, beyond the fact that they are now decidedly smarter as regards their dress, their anatomy is as simple as ever, and the wires which make them move are quite as visible. Were they ever to complicate their machinery, and to attempt to improve themselves, say by means of electricity, they would cease to be worthy of their fame. As they are at the Italian Exhibition and at Hengler's, so were they seen by Charles Dickens years ago in Genoa, when he immortalized them in one of his most diverting pieces of descriptive writing in Sketches from Italy. They need no improvement; for, if they were to be made in the least degree cleverer than they are, they would cease to astonish children and at the same time to amuse their elders. In their present condition, which we believe has changed but little since the days of the Cæsars, they attract brilliant audiences, and prosper to the entire satisfaction of all concerned, manager included—indeed, especially of the manager. Their principal danseuses eclipse Palladino in graceful agility and defy the Lord Chamberlain. We cordially welcome these pleasant and harmless visitors. We have seen the Universal Deluge, and have been greatly edified on beholding the refined manners of Noah as he bows to the beasts as they pass into the ark; and we have heartily applauded the dancing of the prima ballerina in the brilliant ballet Excelsior. Marionettes are really a very important and interesting people—if so we may call them—having a history stretching back into the night of time, and a great historian and dramatist in M. Mongin, who has devoted years to their interests; and has not M. Gounod composed a funeral march in their honour? Why are they called marionettes? This is a question more difficult to answer than many a one of greater import. According to M. Mongin, they obtained this name in Venice, where Marie di legno or Marionette, wooden figures of the Virgin moved by machinery, used to be carried in the processions after the Serenissima had decreed that girls were no longer to dress themselves up as the Madonna. They are not to be confounded with Popozzi—very inferior people indeed, who are not moved by wires, but by the fingers, and who, like our own excellent Punch and Judy, can only appear under certain conditions, which a respectable marionette would consider most undignified and compromising.

RACING AT ASCOT.

THE misfortune which befell Friar's Balsam had been a source of terrible vexation to those who had hoped to see him win the Derby, and the reported lameness of the actual winner of the Derby, at the end of last week, was almost as great a disappointment to racegoers at Ascot. The first race at that meeting was a very close though scarcely a pretty one. Zest, an outsider at 16 to 1, who had been making the running, began to waver in his stride in the manner of a beaten horse at the distance, where Sky Pilot and Palmleaf drew gradually up to him. On nearing the winning-post Sky Pilot seemed to have the race in hand, as Zest was evidently quite pumped out; but somehow or other Zest just rolled in a head in advance of him, while Palmleaf was only half a length behindhand. The colt by Galliard out of Distant Shore, now named Gulliver, was made favourite for the Maiden Plate, on the strength of his third to Gold and Freemason for the Woodcote Stakes at Epsom. Opposite the Royal Inclosure four of the competitors were almost on even terms, and after a beautiful race the favourite, ridden by Webb, won by a head from Kingscote, ridden by T. Cannon, while the second and third and the third and fourth were only separated by necks. That Mr. Houldsworth's Arrandale should have been favourite for the Prince of Wales's Stakes of 2,225*l.* did not say much for the quality of the field that was to contend for it, as he had never won a race. Throughout the greater part of the race he ran very forward, and he took the lead on coming round the bend towards the stands; soon after entering the straight, however, he stopped so suddenly that it was feared he must have broken down, although he showed no signs of lameness after the race. When he gave up racing, Merry Andrew was left in front, though not for long, as the Duke of Westminster's Ossory, followed by Galore and Netheravon, shot past him. After this it was a tame affair, for Ossory ran on and won easily by three lengths. This own brother to Ormonde had only run twice before, the first occasion having been when he won the Criterion Stakes last October, and the second when he was unplaced for the Two Thousand. He is a chestnut colt with good shoulders and strong, lengthy quarters, and he now appeared far more muscular than on the day of the Two Thousand; but, in the opinion of some, he looks rather narrow and split up from behind, and his starting fifth favourite at 10 to 1 did not say much for the estimation in which he was held by the public. The Ascot Stakes was not a very satisfactory race, as the first favourite was a four-year-old carrying 6 st. 10 lbs., and the winner, who started at 20 to 1, was also a four-year-old and only carrying 6 st. 7 lbs. Mr. Brydges-Willyams's Banter had won the Great Northern Handicap at York under 6 st. 2 lbs. by five lengths, so, as he had only 7 lbs. extra to carry for that victory, he became a hot favourite for the Ascot Stakes; but he only ran third, the race being won by Mr. J. Jameson's Dan Dancer, a hurdle-racer who had taken part unsuccessfully in the Grand Hurdle Race at Auteuil last week. On leaving France he had been taken home to Penrith, and only on Monday, on being telegraphed for by his owner, was he brought all the way back to Ascot. He returned to Penrith the next day, after having travelled, it is said, over 1,800 miles in a fortnight. Twenty years had passed since a horse as old as four under so light a weight as 6 st. 7 lbs. had won the Ascot Stakes, and we hope that at least as many years may elapse before such an event occurs again. Mr. Leopold de Rothschild's Cotillon was the favourite for the Gold Vase, as his good and unexpected second to Orbit for the Craven Stakes had not been forgotten. After that race his present owner bought him for 1,500*l.* Ténébreuse, the winner of last year's Grand Prix de Paris, carrying a 7 lbs. penalty, was second favourite, but she ran like a non-stayer, and was beaten when she had gone about a mile and a half of the two mile course. Half-way up the hill, just opposite the new boxes, Exmoor and Cotillon came away together, and fought out a splendid race. Exmoor, who won the Visitors' Plate at Ascot a year ago, was just able to beat Cotillon by a head. Prince Soltykoff's chestnut colt, Gold, the winner of the Woodcote Stakes at Epsom, was made a strong favourite for the Biennial, and he won the race, but not until his backers had had a good fright, as Osborne made a very pretty rush on the outsider, John Elder, a very neat bay colt by Petrarch, that had been unplaced for the Whitsuntide Plate. All that he could do, however, was to collar the favourite and run him to a neck. Lord Durham's chestnut filly, Gulbeyaz, who had won two races and had never yet been beaten, was only half a length behind John Elder. That good stayer, the Duke of Westminster's Savile, was the favourite for the Triennial. Below the distance, Lord Calthorpe's Florentine came away as if he intended to win the race, only to change his mind and throw the whole thing up opposite the Royal Inclosure, leaving the Duke of Beaufort's Dante, to whom he was giving 19 lbs., to win easily, with Devilshoof and Ruddygore as second and third.

On the Wednesday Prince Soltykoff's Sheen, a nice level colt by Hampton, won the Ascot Derby of 1,175*l.* by five lengths, and Lord Londonderry's Hazlehatch had no difficulty in disposing of Lord Randolph Churchill's two-year-old filly L'Abbesse de Jouarre for the Fernhill Stakes. Backers were astute enough to select the winner from among the twenty-two candidates for the Royal Hunt Cup in Captain Machell's Shillelagh, a three-year-old colt by the American-bred sire, Brown Prince. He won a couple of races last year in Ireland, where he was bred, and he was brought over to England, and beaten at Liverpool in the autumn. Captain Machell then bought him, and about a month ago he ran him for the Newmarket Handicap, for which he started first favourite, made the running, and finished only fifth. He was put into the Royal Hunt Cup on the very favourable terms of 6 st. 3 lbs. He is a powerful, deep-bodied brown colt, and he ran well, but he was pressed rather hard by the outsider, Attila, who ran him to a neck, while Veracity, the winner of the Lincolnshire Handicap, was not far behind him. Van Dieman's Land's third for the Derby was proved to be no fluke by his easy victory for the Biennial of 836*l.*, a race in which Chillington made no improvement on his Epsom form. For the Triennial of 621*l.*, Prince Soltykoff's pretty pony, Pantomime, by Mask, was beaten by Mr. Houldsworth's well-shaped and short-legged colt, Regalis, who was running in public for the first time. Although she was giving each of them a stone, Lord Calthorpe's Seabreeze, the winner of the Oaks, had no difficulty in beating her seven opponents for the Coronation Stakes of 2,200*l.*, thereby making her total winnings in stakes 9,272*l.* The last race of the day, the Visitors' Plate of 435*l.*, was won by the disappointing Ashplant, who had not won a race for two years.

As Satiety had not thickened out since last season so much as had been expected, the already mentioned two-year-old, John Elder, was made rather a better favourite for the New Biennial on the Thursday. The two-year-old made the running gaily enough for half the distance, and then Satiety drew up to him, whereupon he tried to swerve and ran in a most ungenerous fashion. Eventually Satiety won in a canter by four lengths. It was reasonable enough to make Seabreeze first favourite for the Rous Memorial Stakes of 970*l.*; yet the shortness of the course and her 10 lbs. disadvantage in the weights were enough to account for her half-length defeat by Mr. H. T. Fenwick's Phil, who has improved very much in appearance since he ran third for the Prince of Wales's Stakes and fourth for the St. Leger last year; nor are critics wanting who doubt whether Phil's victory was not mainly owing to the brilliant riding of T. Cannon Mr. H. M'Calmont had shown good judgment in buying Timothy, even though the price was at a considerable advance on the 4,000 guineas for which Captain Machell had purchased him from "Mr. Manton"; for he won the Ascot Cup in the commonest of canters from a previous winner of that very race, as well as from winners of the Oaks and the Grand Prix de Paris. It is, however, but fair to say that Bird of Freedom was decidedly "groggy," that Rêve d'Or seems to have lost her form, and that Ténébreuse has either done the same or proved herself unable to stay beyond a mile and three-quarters in good company. The Duke of Portland's Donovan walked rather queerly when he came out for the New Stakes; some said that this was owing to warbles under his saddle, others that it was the result of sore shins; nevertheless he won his race, although only by a neck after a desperate struggle with Gulliver, who had been run to a head by Kingscote and to half a length by Clodpole on the Tuesday. As he was giving Gulliver 7 lbs., this performance still left Donovan considerably better than either of the trio; and, if something extra ought to be allowed for the cause of his shrinking under his saddle—whatever it may have been—he may still be considered well at the head of the two-year-olds of the season. Some judges consider him wanting in bone, and rather straight on his forelegs; others, on the contrary, think him a colt with a grand body on short legs, if on a somewhat small scale, and, to his credit be it spoken, he has already won 8,203*l.* in stakes. The five-year-old Deuce of Clubs, who cost 3,500 guineas nearly three years ago, won his maiden race in the All Aged Stakes of 310*l.*, and then came the St. James's Palace Stakes of 1,550 guineas, which produced a magnificent race, ending in a dead heat, between Ossory and Galore. On the Tuesday, when Ossory had beaten Galore easily by three lengths for the Prince of Wales's Stakes, the distance had been a mile and five furlongs, and now the course was only a mile; so, as Galore is a very fast horse, he was just able to catch Ossory. The day ended with a splendid race between Lord Calthorpe's Toscano and Sir W. Throckmorton's Annamite, the former winning by a head.

The Duke of Westminster's Orbit, with 5 to 2 laid on him, swerved in his race for a Triennial of 952*l.*, and was beaten by a neck by Lord Falmouth's filly Rada, who had been second in the Oaks. Possibly the distance may have been too short for Orbit; but we are inclined to doubt it. A field of twenty-four ran for the Wokingham Stakes, and Shillelagh, who had been sold (it was said for 5,000*l.*) after his victory for the Royal Hunt Cup, was made favourite. The race, however, was won by Sir W. Throckmorton's Annamite, by four lengths. It was high time that he won something, as he had lost eleven races consecutively. Mr. Viner's Minting, with 100 to 7 laid on him, won the Hardwicke Stakes of 2,573*l.* from Love-in-Idleness, but scarcely in his best form. In spite of the general idea that his career has been blighted by Ormonde, Minting has now won more than 20,000*l.* The remarkably well-made but perhaps rather small two-year-old, Linkboy, won the Windsor Castle Stakes of 588*l.* He was purchased by Mr. Miller early in May for 2,500*l.*, and he has won three races running. Attila, who had only been beaten by a neck for the Royal Hunt Cup, was made favourite for the High Weight Plate of 615*l.*, and he just won it by a short head from a 20-to-1 outsider. Timothy won the Alexandra Plate in a canter by three lengths from Savile and The Cob, thereby bringing his winnings in stakes up to nearly 11,000*l.*

THE COPPER SYNDICATE.

FOR some little time an uneasy feeling has been growing that a fall in copper is imminent, since it is feared that the great Syndicate which forced up prices so rapidly last autumn then undertook more than it has been able to accomplish. It will be in the recollection of our readers that towards the close of last year there was a sudden rise in the price of the metal from about 40*l.* a ton to over 80*l.* a ton, and at the same time there was an equally rapid advance in the prices of copper-mining Companies' shares. To maintain the rise the Syndicate which manipulated the market entered into contracts with the principal copper-mining Companies all over the world, in which the Syndicate undertook to buy from the Companies at specified prices all the copper which the Companies could not sell to other parties at that price or higher. The Syndicate is represented by the Société des Métaux, and is understood to be supported by several great Paris banks and by powerful financial houses in Paris, London, and elsewhere. It must, of course, have been foreseen by the members of the Syndicate that so great a rise in price would attract copper from all parts of th world. Every one who had old copper to dispose of would naturally hurry it to market, while the copper-mining Companies likewise would be stimulated to increase their output. And this has occurred. In the eight months from the 1st of October to the end of May, the imports of copper into England and France amounted to very nearly 84,000 tons, while in the corresponding period of last year they were only slightly over 50,000 tons. There was thus an increase in the eight months, compared with last year, of very nearly 34,000 tons, or almost 68 per cent. The members of the Syndicate, as we have said, must have been prepared for this increase in imports, and at first sight they seem to be justified in their anticipations of success by the fact that the sales for consumption from the great storehouses have rather increased. Thus sales from the great storehouses to buyers supposed to be consumers of the metal amounted in the eight months ended with May to 63,577 tons, against 60,137 tons in the corresponding period of last year. There is here an increase of about 5 per cent. in the actual deliveries for consumption—a very remarkable fact, indeed, when we bear in mind that the price of the metal is double now what it was last year. But the satisfaction with the figures in the eyes of the Syndicate must be greatly lessened when they look at the deliveries for consumption month by month. Since the 1st of January there has been a very great falling off in the deliveries. Thus, to take the single month of May, there were only about 6,000 tons delivered for consumption, against about 10,000 tons in May of last year. The increase in the deliveries was entirely in the three last months of last year. It would seem that the sudden rise in price which began early in October so alarmed the manufacturers who use copper in any considerable quantities that they bought largely, so as to replenish their stocks; but ever since the present year began the purchases by manufacturers and other consumers have greatly decreased—have been little more, in fact, than two-thirds of what they were in the first five months of last year.

There would seem to be no doubt, then, that various economies are being practised for the purpose of avoiding the use of copper in telegraphy, in the construction of steam-engines, and the like. It is said, indeed, that copper is being largely replaced by steel, and that to this is due the falling off in the purchases for consumption during the past five months. There are no means of checking the accuracy of these statements, but we doubt whether economies of this kind are possible on a very great scale. In certain parts of steam-engines, for example, copper has always in this country been regarded as much safer than steel, and there is no question that it is so, unless great care is taken to use only soft water, and also in the choice of fuels. It is hardly probable, therefore, that, for the mere sake of saving what after all is not a very large proportion in the total cost of a railway engine, copper would be largely displaced by steel. Still economies of the kind are being practised to some extent, and do account, partially at least, for the falling off in the purchases of the past five months. At the same time, it is reasonably to be assumed that, while the price of copper was so excessively low last year, stocks were largely replenished; secondly, that, when the rise began in October, the purchasers for consumption, as we stated above, were on an extraordinary scale; and, thirdly, that consumers believe the present rise cannot be maintained, and, consequently, are keeping out of the market in the hope that a fall must occur. But, whether economies are being practised upon a very large scale or not, it is unquestionable that the quantity of copper which the Syndicate has to buy is very large. We showed above that the imports of copper into this country and France exceed the imports in the corresponding eight months of last year by about 68 per cent., and that, on the other hand, the sales for consumption exceed those of the corresponding period of last year only about 5 per cent. Last year, in the eight months ended with May, the total imports were in round figures about 50,000 tons, and the total sales for consumption about 60,000 tons. There were, therefore, 10,000 tons sold more than were imported into the two countries in the period under review, or about 20 per cent. But in the eight months of this year, while the imports were nearly 84,000 tons, the deliveries were under 64,000 tons. In other words, the sales for consumption fell short of the imports by 20,000 tons, or nearly 25 per cent. Under the arrangements entered into by the Syndicate with the copper-mining Companies the Syndicate is clearly bound, if called upon, to take up and pay for all this vast excess of imports over consumption. It is noticeable, however, that the imports from the United States during the past eight months have been very large, and it is possible, therefore, that stocks in the United States have been greatly reduced. In other words, it is possible that the increase in the imports into the United Kingdom and France which has led to a marked increase in the stock of unsold copper in the principal storehouses may be due largely to the removal of unused stocks from one side of the Atlantic to the other. The Syndicate, it will be recollected, entered into arrangements with the American Companies as well as with the Companies of other countries, and the imports may be due possibly to those arrangements. As we have not the figures of the American supply before us, it is not yet proved that there has actually taken place a very great increase in the production. If we look alone at the figures of the imports into the United Kingdom and France, it seems clear that a marked increase in production must have occurred; but if, as is possible, the increase in the imports is due rather to the transhipment of stocks already existing in the United States to Europe than to the export from the United States of newly-raised copper, there will not be the marked increase in production that the figures at first sight suggest.

Even if it be true, however, that the unused stocks in the United States have been reduced, the position of the Syndicate is not greatly improved. Naturally it takes a considerable time to increase the output from the mines of the world. It was only in October last that the rise began. The rise was probably regarded by mineowners, as well as by others, as a temporary market fluctuation; but when they perceived that a great Syndicate possessed of a vast capital had manipulated the rise, and intended to do its utmost to maintain the movement, then mineowners naturally took measures to increase their output. It would be only gradually, however, that those measures would bear fruit, and it is rather in the future than in the immediate past that the results will be seen. If this be so, if the output from all the mines is increased in a marked degree, as it promises to be, and as, in the nature of things, it ought to be, then the Syndicate will be called upon month after month to take up and pay for larger and larger quantities of copper. The members of the Syndicate hope that economies in the use of copper cannot be introduced with sufficient rapidity and sufficient safety to enable manufacturers and other consumers to reduce greatly their purchases of the metal, and therefore they predict that by-and-bye consumers will have to increase their purchases. Consumers, on the other hand, maintain that the economies are possible and will be practised. It seems, however, that the members of the Syndicate are not quite so confident as they were, inasmuch as they are reported to be endeavouring to form in Paris a great Company which shall take upon itself all the obligations incurred by the Syndicate in reference to the copper-mining Companies. It is hardly likely that the general public will subscribe to a Company which is to take over from the members of the Syndicate such heavy obligations. If the Société des Métaux, the great Paris banks, and the principal financial houses of Europe regard those obligations as so heavy that they wish to pass them on to a Company formed for the purpose, it is not probable that the general public will subscribe to that Company, and it certainly is not desirable that they should do so. But it is possible that the members of the Syndicate themselves and their immediate friends and connexions may join the Company. It is understood that the great banks guaranteed the engagements of the Syndicate only for a single year. The year will expire at the end of September; and, unless the guarantee is renewed or a Company powerful enough to take upon itself all the obligations of the Syndicate and inspire confidence in the public is formed, then the Syndicate must fall to pieces. Rather than see it so fall to pieces, it is possible that the principal members of the Syndicate may form a Company themselves, and attempt to carry on the operations of the Syndicate for another year or two. On the other hand, many members of the Syndicate must begin to doubt whether it is possible very long to maintain a price which is now seen to be clearly artificial. The price of copper was too low when it stood at 40*l.* a ton, as is clearly proved by the fact that, notwithstanding the price is double as much now, the consumption during the eight months ended with May was somewhat larger than that of the corresponding period of last year. But it seems equally evident that at 80*l.* a ton and over the price is too high, since, as we have been pointing out above, consumption has been greatly falling off since the 1st of January. But if the price, as is generally admitted, is now too high, many members of the Syndicate must see that an excessive price cannot be permanently maintained, that the longer it is maintained the larger will be the liabilities incurred, and that when at last a fall does come, the loss will be all the greater. Many people, therefore, doubt whether it will prove possible to form this great Company, and if the Company is not formed, and the guarantee of the banks is not renewed, then it seems evident that the Syndicate must go to pieces. Should that occur, the losses doubtless will be very heavy. Much, no doubt, will depend upon the course of politics.

THE PICTURES AT THE ITALIAN EXHIBITION.

To be just to modern Italian art we must criticize it on its own merits, and not by the standard of the great masters of the past; for, since the middle of the eighteenth century until quite recently, Italy has produced no artist of exceptional distinction. Modern Italian art, both in sculpture and painting, is entirely new, and, in a certain degree, quite as much a matter of to-day as the American school, and, like it unfortunately, only too much addicted to imitating the French. On close examination the vast majority of the pictures shown at the Exhibition appear carelessly and hastily painted, the details slovenly, the figures out of proportion and drawing, and the architecture and landscape not in perfect perspective. On the other hand, the colouring is almost invariably good, rich, and harmonious, and the subjects well chosen, barring always some few horrible Zolaistic realisms which ought to be burnt. The dozen or so really great pictures are, however, so very fine that we are compelled to acknowledge with regret that our own exhibitions cannot show anything to approach them in general excellence. Mr. Whitley has wisely arranged the pictures lent by the King of Italy and the Italian Government by themselves. Each being in its way a masterpiece, they would certainly have dwarfed the majority of the pictures in the other rooms. They will be found to the right immediately on entering the Exhibition from West Brompton. The most striking is Signor Francesco Jacovacci's "Vittoria Colonna and Michael Angelo." The body of the dead poetess, robed in white satin, is seen stretched upon a bier. Michael Angelo leans over her, and lifts her stiff hand to his lips. The colouring is exceedingly strong, and the manner in which the folds of the white satin gown are made to stand out from the surrounding gloom is worthy of Rembrandt. Although the face of the dead woman is painted with terrible realism, it does not offend the sense of repose, being so perfectly rendered. The whole aspect of this fine picture is solemnly majestic. Next to it hangs another noble work, "Refugium Peccatorum," by Luigi Nono. The scene is on the terrace of a landing-place near Venice. Standing out against a rainy autumnal sky is the pedestal of a statue of the Virgin, before whom burns a lamp adorned with a few flowers. On the wet pavement, strewn with dry leaves, a poor girl kneels in an agony of shame and remorse, praying to the Refuge of Sinners. Her attitude is so full of passion and pathos, that the fact that her face is hidden is scarcely noticed. The whole work is replete with genius—a poem on canvas. "The Flight of Pope Eugenius IV." is a powerful but rather melodramatic picture by Pio Joris. "The Charge of the Bersaglieri," by Signor M. Cammerano, is spirited, but to us, at least, uninteresting. "The Forest of Fontainebleau," by Giuseppe Palizzi, is admirably painted, and "Winter," by Calderini, is a softly treated view in the gardens of the Pincio on a gloomy day. In the same room with these pictures are three by Favoretto, whose death last year cast a gloom over the Italian art world. Needless to say that they represent scenes in Venice, and are painted with all the brilliance of colouring and knowledge of effect which rendered this regretted artist so deservedly popular. Judging by the crowd always assembled in admiration before them, Professor Giuseppe Sciuti's two immense pictures are the most attractive of any. Unquestionably they give evidence of extraordinary talent, and, if we except certain evidence of the scene-painter's art about them, they are certainly very imposing. The subjects, however, must be found rather uninteresting by the general British public, which is not, we fear, very familiar with Herodotus and Plutarch, to which authorities the Catalogue dryly refers its readers for further information concerning the Battle of Imera and the Second Foundation of Rome. Signor Sciuti's figures are boldly and well drawn, and his grouping is beyond praise. His smaller pictures are less good. The "Chariot Race," however, is spirited, and the "Light of the World"—in reality, the "Madonna and Child"—is graceful. In the adjoining room is a collection of pictures by two well-known Italian "impressionists," Cremona and Segantini. Signor Tranquillo Cremona has won deserved popularity, and his "A Mother's Love," if seen from a certain distance, is delightful. The two heads are very pretty, and equally clever in their way are "Smiles" and "The Love Child," by the same artist. Signor Segatini paints in a dry and hard fashion scenes of rural life, and indulges in curious effects of white and blue, yellow and green, which at a distance produce effects quite lost on close inspection. Perhaps the finest example of this artist's decidedly original style is the "Ave Maria," on which we see a boat full of sheep under the care of a shepherdess and her father, who are singing the "Ave Maria" as they pass slowly by twilight across a tranquil lake. Signor Angelo Morbelli's "The Viaticum" deserves notice; the effect of the light surrounding the priest who carries the Host, seen through a dim window, being particularly striking. Signor Edulo Eruli's "Pergolese at the Funeral of the Princess Spinelli" (672) is in every way a remarkable picture. It represents the choir of a Dominican nunnery. The body of the broken-hearted girl, who was forced by her relentless father to take the veil, is seen stretched, according to the Italian custom, on the pavement of the church. The friars are singing a dirge, and Pergolese himself kneels in despair at the foot of the bier. It is a most picturesque and romantic scene, dramatic, but not at all theatrical. The grouping of the numerous figures is admirable, and the colouring rich and harmonious. "Lacrimæ Rerum," by Natale Attanasio, is a painful picture, but very well painted and full of pathos, representing the interior of that department of a mad-house which is devoted to women suffering from religious mania. There are subjects best left alone, and this is one of the number. "A Winter Marriage," by Eugenio Prati, is a pretty picture of a group of Piedmontese peasants returning in the snow from a wedding. Signor Baccani's Orange Girl is well painted and pretty. A charming bit of seaside life at Naples is "Christening a Boat," by Signor Montefusco, who has a number of other very good scenes of Neapolitan life here. Signor Antonio Leto has a rough and strong head of a Neapolitan fisherman; and Signor L. Rossi's "A Venetian Scene—Seventeenth Century" (524) is very quaint. A group of ladies in hooped skirts, wearing the black satin zendallo, or hood, so often mentioned by Goldoni, are seen with their cavaliers ascending and descending a magnificent marble staircase, the roof above glowing with frescoes and gilding. Signor Joris's "Il Canastone" (468), in which we see a village congregation filing quietly out of church in the twilight, is reposeful and refined. Near it is a small picture, called "The Bridge of Love," by Francesco Brunery—a group of people, in magnificent costumes of the seventeenth century, are playing an old-fashioned game in a sumptuous apartment. It is painted with wonderful precision, and with a finish worthy of Teniers or Meissonier. Almost opposite is a pretty head of a girl, "Ninella," by Signor Giorgio del Grillo.

The landscapes are numerous, and some of them excellent, but, as a rule, not equal to our own. They lack quality and atmosphere. Of views of Venice there are at least a hundred, and most of them are picturesque, the best being those by Miss Clara Montalba, and Signori Campriani, Comirato, Luigi, Lanza, and Rosa. The portraits are decidedly inferior. Among the best is a very pretty portrait of Miss Eva Mendelssohn, by Attilio Baccani; a good full-length portrait of the Italian Royal Family, by Chev. Desanges; and a very strong portrait of Mr. J. R. Whitley, by Signor Pappacena.

Mr. Robert Browning sends an interesting view of Mrs. Browning's study in Casa Guidi, and Signor Eruli a series of marvellous imitations of tapestry. There are also, by the way, in this gallery some magnificent ancient tapestries of great interest woven in Brussels, after designs by Giulio Romano, lent by Signor Brancaccio. The water-colour drawings are innumerable, and many of them admirable, but none of extraordinary merit.

The gardens of the Exhibition, now that they are completed, are certainly very charming, and the reproduction of the Podesta's palace at Padua is most realistic. Internally it is an ordinary concert-hall, at present tenanted by a highly intelligent troupe of marionettes. Signor Liverani's view of the Forum is well worth seeing, and so, by the way, is the magnificent show of rhododendrons and various kinds of lilies made by Mr. Goldring, the clever designer of these pretty gardens.

RICHTER CONCERTS.

Last Monday's concert may fairly rank as one of the musical events of the present season. La Damnation de Faust has been rendered in London without any hint of disregard for the composer's intentions and with all the loving care and faultless intuition and power which Dr. Richter bestows upon the music which he brings forward. His orchestra has never been heard to greater advantage. Although the performance of its members was throughout admirable, we may select the trumpets for especial praise—indeed it is hardly too much to say that the beautiful trumpet canons which are to be met with in the score have on this occasion been perfectly played for the first time within our recollection. Berlioz has been often and sharply criticized for his fondness for writing rapid passages, often presenting great difficulties for the brass. Dr. Richter and his executants have given the best of all possible answers to this objection. Berlioz has, perhaps, suffered more than any other musician from the ignorance and stupidity of conductors who have undertaken the heavy task of interpreting his works. No better proof of the truth of this assertion can be brought forward than that contained in the difference of the effect produced by the music of the "Infernal Orgy" as interpreted by Dr. Richter from the flat, lifeless travesty of the composer's intentions to which we have suffered ourselves to become accustomed under other hands. It is a noteworthy fact that the chorus, thanks to the artistic inspiration with which it was fired, produced a far more impressive effect in this scene than has been attained by more powerful and better exercised bodies of voices on other occasions. The Hungarian March, which is so largely dependent for its effect on the refinement and nervous energy with which the brass is handled, was played as if, to quote from Wagner, the orchestra "had swallowed the Devil." It is needless to add that the tempo adopted by Dr. Richter was absolutely right. The Ballet of Sylphs afforded an opportunity for the display of that rarest of phenomena—a full pianissimo—in contradistinction to the feeble and slightly discordant series of whispers from the orchestra with which we are so frequently afflicted. It seems invidious to dwell upon any slight flaw which may have occurred in such an artistic and life-giving performance; but Dr. Richter's very marked insistence on the suggestion of the spinning-wheel in the ballad of the "King of Thule" appears to us to be open to objection. The profoundly poetical introduction to the Legend charged with the fresh sap and the bright wet skies of spring was greatly rendered, and the orchestral accompaniments throughout were treated with unerring discrimination and power. The bitter weather was not favourable to the singing of the chorus, but we must in justice admit that they came fairly well through the intensely trying ordeal of the chorus of soldiers and students. Their singing of the Easter Hymn—one of the most contestable numbers to be met with in the course of the work—betrayed, on the other hand, considerable weakness and hesitation. Mr. Santley is always a great artist, and, although his voice was affected by the unfavourable atmospheric conditions which prevailed, he sang with incomparable style, and perfect understanding of the composer's intention. Mr. Edward Lloyd's voice and method have in nowise suffered from his recent tour in America; but he occasionally lacks dramatic impulse, and we cannot congratulate either him or Miss Mary Davies on their industrious declamation of the passionate and beautiful music committed to their charge. Miss Davies, however, must not call the King of Thu-le the King of Thowl. The concert opened with a deeply impressive performance of the funeral march from the Götterdämmerung, played in a spirit befitting the occasion which gave rise to its performance. The concert given on June 11 is chiefly memorable for the astonishingly brilliant performances of Liszt's first Hungarian Rhapsody, and an admirable rendering of the "Charfreitags-Zauber," from Parsifal. Dr. Mackenzie's Overture to Twelfth Night was repeated, and Mr. Henri Marteau was heard in M. Saint-Saëns's "Introduction et Rondo Capriccioso." Wagner's "Faust Overture," and "Trauer-Marsch," and Mozart's "Jupiter" Symphony completed the programme.

MINOR EXHIBITIONS.

IN these p[...]s we have often spoken of the advantages of small exhibitions and one-man shows. They give people opportunities of studying delicate art quietly, and of learning to appreciate refined work which would be overlooked in the garish confusion of a large miscellaneous exhibition. Some great and thorough painters possess all qualities in a high degree. They are more or less armed at every point; they are strong as well as delicate and personal; they can resist all influences, and can hold their own amongst even the most powerful neighbours. This is not the case with many kinds of really artistic genius. There are pictures which produce their effect slowly; which speak, as it were, in a low voice, and only to those who listen. To do justice to such work one must be introduced to it under conditions more or less similar to those of a private room. The small gallery and the one-man show are necessary for these pictures, which, after all, best meet the requirements of the ordinary buyer and the ordinary house.

This week we have to speak of several men who deserve the title of artist. In their several, perhaps rather narrow paths, the brothers Maris, Messrs. Alfred Parsons and E. A. Abbey, and Mr. Heath Wilson all show special natural gifts and a natural love of special sides of nature. Of course, James and Matthew Maris by the scope of their work, by the originality of their imaginations, by the power of their treatments of material, by the completeness and breadth of their styles are bigger men than any of the others, and stand on a broader and loftier platform. James Maris, as we have said in former articles, belongs to a school which has the merit of having occupied itself with nature and with artistic style in a very happy proportion. Corot, to mention a most illustrious example, was as much concerned about the aspect of a canvas as about doing justice to those qualities which he admired in nature. He allowed his impression of an effect to colour his imagination, to determine the character of his pictorial ensemble; but then he took care that his canvas, as decoration, should make an appeal consonant with the sentiment of the original effect. He admitted nothing useless, nothing contradictory, and so his work affects you with the singleness of a perfume or an old tune. Style and matter tell the same story, and when you look unconsciously at his pictures without taking in what they represent their decorative pattern still marks the proper key of feeling. Where Linnell accompanied the grave vastness of a large sunset with a pattern of mean mechanical little dots, Corot spread broad, cloudy, magically-gradated masses, bearing hints of detail spotted in with more than Japanese significance and beauty. We claim for James Maris that he has followed this example, and has worked at making his pictures look all of a piece. Keeping to some ensemble of feeling, enforcing some grand general character of expression would seem to be the real object of the true artist. Maris seeks something very different, something infinitely less elegant and classic than Corot, but he seeks it with the same art and judgment. His fine appreciation of the character of the stuff he works in enables him to reject any forms, colours, or combinations which contradict his ensemble or seem foreign to his key of feeling. English art became for a time utterly dead to the character of the materials of a picture, and only alive to the story related or the piece of nature represented. This is the lowest depth of art; it is as if musicians lost all feeling for the intrinsic character of musical intervals and phrases, and used them only to imitate natural noises. So much seems necessary for the comprehension of a view of art which Englishmen are happily now beginning to understand and practise as well as Dutchmen. "On the Quay" (2) contains one of the softest and deepest amongst James Maris's many fine rolling skies. "The Shower (Ploughing)" (5) shows an effect carefully observed at first hand and, in the painting especially of sky and distance, a lovely quality as of old porcelain. But the good work of James Maris is too numerous to mention, whether water-colour, as "Clouds Passing over Dunes" (63) and "Twilight" (65), or oil, as "A Cloud Effect" (30) and "An Old Dutch City" (11). Occasionally, as in "The Three Windmills" (3), James Maris is inclined to a brutality of method and to a neglect of his usual finesse in "values." The less thorough and realistic and more dreamily imaginative art of his brother Matthew is very slightly represented. No such complete idea of his powers can be gained as was given by Mr. Hamilton Bruce's gathering of his work in the Foreign Loan Section of the Edinburgh Exhibition. "Sunday Morning" (10) and "The Drawbridge" (15) are the most typical of his brown, close range of colour and his strange, fantastic feeling for pictorial arrangement. "Near the Hague" (52), perhaps the best William Maris, shows a fresh, aërial plain, a quiet pool, and several wandering cattle. Taken as a whole, this collection is one of the most interesting shows we have yet seen at the Goupil Galleries.

Messrs. E. A. Abbey and Alfred Parsons have a show of black-and-white drawings at the rooms of the Fine Art Society which proves that each works in his own corner of the field with genuine artistic feeling. Mr. Abbey is more than an accomplished draughtsman; he enters thoroughly into the situations and characters that he means to represent, and he gives a gesture or an expression with a sincerity and a sympathy that are more valuable than merely clever technique. When he chooses, however, he also gratifies the eye with fine artistic arrangement and selection. "A Chamber in an Old-Fashioned House—enter Mrs. Hardcastle and Mr. Hardcastle," No. 7 in the illustrations to She Stoops to Conquer, is just what a black-and-white in line should be. There is not too much in it and no unnecessary scrabble of strokes. Many as good may be found; but there is no denying that Mr. Abbey has done too much, and that in a drawing here and there the technique has the air of being scratchy, hurried, and overloaded. In whatever he does Mr. Parsons shows a sincere and ardent search of form and a wonderful command of technical resources. This does not prevent his attaining an exquisite simplicity in some of the drawings in full tone. "Twilight" (93), a river scene, is very broad and poetical; and we may say the same of "Stonington" (111), a street view. In "Poppies" (86) he shows a beautiful refinement of method, and in "A Sea Fight" (96) the close values of the sky are most delicately rendered.

Mr. W. Heath Wilson has a real gift of colour. One does not often see a collection of little oil sketches more evenly charming than his exhibition "Venice" at Messrs. Clifford & Co.'s gallery, Piccadilly. You will see a harmony and variety about the tender colouring of these broadly-treated little gems which you may look for in vain in the majority of large, ambitious, and high-priced canvases. Mr. Wilson adds to a tasteful arrangement of colours an excellent distribution of quantities in his masses, and an appreciation of aërial effect which enables him to dispense with petty details without falling into an appearance of emptiness. Out of many good things we may mention "Sunset from the Lido" (6), a rich sky red at the base contrasted with deep blue water; "The Dogana" (12), lovely in its general tone of warm suffused air, in the effectively planted orange sail, in the varied pearly tones of the softly undulating water; "Laguna" (8), a sketch of silvery sea and a group of distant sails; "Towers of Lucca" (42), with a pearly sky, purple-blue hills, and the tall, straight shafts of building shooting up in the middle distance; "Florence by Moonlight" (55), an exquisite night scene, and Nos. 61, 68, 7, 32, and 9.

The Dudley Art Society's water-colours deserve more space than we can give them, for, amongst a good deal of rubbish, one sees signs of improvement in the stronger men. Water-colour is so decidedly the favourite refuge of the weak and of those who cannot see for themselves that many people think strength and sincerity foreign to the medium. The aspect of nature, however, can be rendered in water-colour with the same power and truth as in oils, and those who fail must offer an equivalent in fine decorative quality or be counted incompetent. Mr. W. Rupert Stevens is one of the most robust realists of this gallery, and with him we must rank Mr. Claude Hayes and Mr. L. Doucet. Among Mr. W. R. Stevens's best things are a fine bold figure sketch, "Marie —Antwerp Peasant" (301), and a splendidly broad rendering of sky, distance, and a large stretch of beach peopled with figures, "Sand, a Langham Sketch" (302). Mr. Claude Hayes gives a very true and striking representation of a red sunrise in his "Frosty Morning" (196); and Mr. L. Doucet presents a figure under a real effect of light and with well subdued accessories in his "Outdoor Study" (139). Among ladies' work Miss Daisy Gresley's "Rome from Ponte Molle" (72), worked with a fresh, lively touch; Miss K. Macaulay's firmly drawn "Prawning Boat" (2), and Miss Sophia Beale's carefully observed "Ethelbert Gate, Norwich" (166), are perhaps the most thorough. Good work also comes from Miss Rose Barton, Miss Harriet Skidmore, Miss Bailward, Miss M. Bernard, Miss M. A. Butler, Miss O'Hara, and one or two more. Mr. Walter Severn, Mr. S. F. G. Giampetri, Mr. J. M. Donne, Mr. R. Richardson, Mr. W. Bennett, Mr. S. Key, and Mr. C. W. Ronby contribute pleasant work. Mr. W. Lloyd in "Watching their Chance to Gybe" (273), without showing any feeling for pictorial beauty, gives proof of a conscientious study of marine subjects, and a thorough sympathy with one side of nature. A set of black-and-whites by Mr. E. Wagner show great fertility of invention in subject.

Two Exhibitions dealing with Japanese art are now open in Bond Street. Messrs. Dowdeswell show a large collection of Kakémonos, or scroll pictures; the Japanese Fine Art Association a miscellaneous assemblage of lacquer, wood and metal work, pottery, drawings, embroidery, &c. We can by no means swallow everything that comes from Japan, or accept the doctrine of the infallibility of Eastern taste. Spottiness is a common fault. Elaboration of pattern pays very well in decoration when the details are grouped under larger masses, and some breadth of system gives unity to the design. This is frequently altogether absent, while (may we say it?) crude and undigested colour is too often present. We spoke above of the art of Corot and his school. Grander, and as tasteful in decoration, it possesses an unspeakably deeper and more significant poetry from its fuller and closer association with natural beauty. At Messrs. Dowdeswell's many schools of painting are illustrated, and probably none will appeal so surely to English artists as that which Okio chiefly helped to found. "Puppies at Play" (415), "Carp in Stream" (461), "Rat on Feather-brush" (409), will give an idea of his quiet harmony of colour and his masterly realistic drawing. "Peonies and Sparrow" (73), by Oguri-Sotan, is a good example of a still earlier realistic school; while the "Sixteen Rakhans" (1), "Bensaiten" (2), and "Armida" (3) are specimens of the solemn style of many hundred years ago. Work by So-sen, Yosai, Hokusai, and others, should not be passed over.

At the galleries of the Association no finer specimens of lacquer can be found than "Writing-table and Case" (1), "Gold Lacquered and Inlaid Cabinet" (7), and "Round Gold Lacquered and Inlaid Picture" (10), which last represents, with great finesse of expression, Confucius, Laotze, and Buddha. In metal-work it would be difficult to beat "Inlaid Iron Vase" (38), by Komai. The pattern is at once elaborate and large, and as graceful as it is original. If anything would content one more, it would be perhaps such a grand, unadorned bronze as the Chinese "Sacrificial Vase" (43). Amongst Chinese and Japanese ware there is much that is beautifully harmonious in colour and design. Such are the large bottle (54), with its bold pattern of blue and white, and its admirable finesse of drawing; the green and red candlestick (68); "Imari Reticulated Dish" (87), with its curious archaic colouring; the tender hues of the "Cloisonné Bottle" (93), and the noble black jar (53).

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA.

COVENT GARDEN had not previously this season been so full as it was on Saturday evening, when Lohengrin was represented. The conjunction of Mme. Albani and MM. Jean and Edouard de Reszké would account for a crowded theatre; but the popularity of Lohengrin is, at the same time, undoubted. This by no means implies what is understood as conversion to Wagnerism. When, at the end of the first performance of the Ring des Nibelungen, in the Bayreuth Theatre, Herr Wagner claimed credit for having given the world a new art—the cogency of the claim need not be here examined—it was understood that the gift involved the suppression and extinction of the old art; opera of the hitherto existing school was to be heard no more; but to this new art the world has by no means taken kindly. Lohengrin is admired because so much of it is beautiful as beauty in music was understood before the new art—only the glimmerings of which are here and there found in Lohengrin, at any rate in the version as played in England—came into existence. For the sake of that which is beautiful audiences accept that which is not, and under this latter head must be included the parts of Ortruda and Telramondo. There is a quaint simplicity in the observations of the Times' critic on this head. He shared with other devotees of Herr Wagner the most ardent admiration for Ortruda's score. After hearing it a great many times, these devotees "did not quite know what to make of it," and so they wrote to the composer to ask what it all meant. Could there be evidence of a more guileless faith? Herr Wagner replied at considerable length. Ortrud was a woman who did not know love. "Politics are her essence," he wrote, with amplification of the idea, and need it be said that next time these enthusiasts heard the opera they found every bar eloquently descriptive of the mediæval female politician? Can we believe that, if Herr Wagner had told them anything else, they would not have believed that with equal fervour? The gist of our complaint against the later developments of Wagnerism, the reason why we oppose the creed, is contained in the anecdote. Music which does not explain itself, the meaning of which has to be set forth in writing, lacks the very first essential that true music should possess. The Times' critic also tells us that M. Jean de Reszké seemed to "float on the waves of beautiful sound," and, though a less rhapsodical writer would scarcely have had such a phenomenal exploit suggested to him, we are privileged to grasp the meaning of the phrase. The charm of Lohengrin's music is not to be resisted; but we are not, and never shall be, reconciled to the utterances of the "reactionary woman" and her unloved husband.

The recent performance was of remarkable excellence as regards principals and orchestra, and we are almost disposed to include choristers, for much of their work was done in highly creditable style. At times they lacked balance and steadiness; but we have never heard these choruses given in a way that was beyond criticism, and the Covent Garden singers acquitted themselves decidedly well. We desire to do them no less than justice, still it must not be said that the amazement at the appearance of the knight in the distance, and his welcome as the deliverer of the slandered maiden, were expressed with all possible significance. Later on the music grows simpler, and fuller justice was done to it. Mme. Albani's Elsa has been known for several years past as an interpretation of exceptional merit. She fills the part as well as it can be filled by an artist gifted with high intelligence, a nice sense of dramatic aptitude, and a capacity for the exhibition of emotion; who in fact is deficient in nothing but the inspiration of genius. Mme. Albani was somewhat above her usual level of excellence, doubtless for the reason that her companion sustained her. M. Jean de Reszké approaches nearly to the ideal Lohengrin —we are not likely soon to see another who falls so little short, for the experience of past years has taught us how rare is the union of the voice, the vocalist, and the actor. We wish nevertheless that some competent director would rearrange the fight with Telramondo. Mr. Harris's stage management is generally reasonable and often skilful, but we feel that if this duel occurred in a play at the Lyceum it would be more effectively contrived. It does not resolve itself into the childish pushing match that we have sometimes seen, but Elsa's accuser is overcome a great deal too easily. It is with the whiff and wind of Lohengrin's sword that Telramondo falls, and though of course the knight had supernatural aid—a circumstance which detracts somewhat from the credit due to heroism—and so might have quelled the traitor as he chose, if a fight takes place on the stage it should be fought with vigour. It is curious to observe how little action there is in the parts of Lohengrin, the King, and Elsa, and yet how much effect they create. The duel apart, few operatic personages preserve so calm a demeanour as the Knight of the Swan, who, nevertheless, in the hands of such an artist as M. Jean de Reszké, is always prominent and impressive. Again M. Edouard de Reszké shared the honours of the evening with his brother. The stately air of the warrior king is admirably preserved, and the music could not be more appropriately rendered. The King has the luxury of a few vocal phrases to sing, as, for instance, in the prayer; the Herald has nothing but proclamations to issue, and the one thing demanded of him is to declaim them with accurate intonation. This Signor Navarrini did, and he is therefore to be commended. Telramondo and his political wife found energetic representatives in Signor d'Andrade and Mme. Hastreiter, and energy, if duly directed, is here a leading necessity. We are not in the least convinced that the music of these characters would not have been quite as expressive if it had also been agreeable; nevertheless, there is cause to be grateful for Lohengrin as it exists. Mme. Hastreiter did far better as Ortruda than as Donizetti's Leonora last season.

Little need be said about the representation of the Barbiere. We are not alone in our opinion as to Mlle. Arnoldson's absence of qualifications for a leading position at Covent Garden. Her rendering of Meyerbeer's "Shadow Song," interpolated into the Lesson Scene, was sadly laboured and lacking in fluency. The Almaviva of Signor Ravelli and the Figaro of Signor d'Andrade were but indifferent performances. Neither vocalist did justice to Rossini's florid music. Indeed, the art of singing this music seems to be growing extinct. M. Edouard de Reszké's Basilio was, however, excellent, and we confess that Signor Ciampi's Bartolo amuses us.

DRAMATIC RECORD.

ONE of the characters in Mr. C. Haddon Chambers's new play, Captain Swift, produced during the week at the Haymarket Theatre, comments on "the long arm of coincidence." It is a metaphor which must be cautiously employed, but we shall perhaps be safe in saying that in Mr. Chambers's play this arm has a peculiarly comprehensive and remarkable embrace. Captain Swift is the professional name of a notorious Queensland bushranger, who visits England when the colony has grown too hot to hold him. He chances to be passing along a London street when an old gentleman named Seabrook is knocked down by a hansom cab, and "Mr. Wilding," as the bushranger calls himself, rescues the victim of the accident from a perilous position under the wheels. The muscles of the long arm of coincidence are here being expanded. Mr. Seabrook asks his preserver to dine, and it gradually appears that Mrs. Seabrook is Captain Swift's mother; that the Seabrook butler is the Captain's foster-brother; and that the only other guest besides himself is a Queensland squatter, Mr. Gardiner, from whom Swift had once stolen a famous black horse. In course of time a detective, in search of the bushranger, calls at the house, and meets the object of his quest (whom he does not know) face to face, and this is another coincidence—indeed, nothing but the appearance of the black horse is wanted to make the series of coincidences quite complete and to gather under the roof of the casual stranger met in the street all who had been in any way connected with the bushranger's proceedings, so far as the story is concerned with them. This is really too much coincidence—the arm is unduly long. It is as if Box and Cox not only discovered that they were long-lost brothers, but also that Mrs. Bouncer was their mother, Mr. Knox a first cousin, and Penelope Ann an aunt by marriage. Mr. Chambers would have got on better without the butler, a very melodramatic personage whose behaviour is generally impossible. If the author reconstructs his play, as he may perhaps see the advisability of doing, the butler should go. He increases the sum of coincidences beyond the limits of probability, he is really of little service, and is a personage who not only never would be missed, but who is a source of weakness rather than of strength.

Beating about the bush after the manner of some modern French writers for the stage is not an example to be imitated; but Mr. Chambers hastens to state his case in a way that is deficient in tact. Mrs. Seabrook is agitated when she appears in the drawing-room after dinner, and at once makes reference to her son, a child born before her marriage with Mr. Seabrook—before she was married at all, in fact—and sent away, she never knew whither, immediately after its birth by her sister. It is, of course, understood that the son, whom she has never seen since its early infancy, is Wilding; and we are also informed that something in Wilding's manner awakens suspicion. For ourselves, when presently he enters the room, we do not perceive the doubtful bearing. Wilding is easy, agreeable, and well-bred. He is evidently attracted by Mrs. Seabrook's pretty niece, Stella Darbisher, and we very much wish him success in his suit, particularly as her cousin, Harry Seabrook, who also loves her, is not at all an interesting youth. Here, the reader will perceive, is the vital fault of the plot. It is the most elementary rule in all dramatic work, tragedy alone excepted, that a play should tend towards a conclusion which the audience desire to see reached. That is an indispensable condition of success. But what have we here? The child was deserted and cast away by his mother; and for that he wins sympathy. He has broken the law—is, indeed, a robber; but it is expressly stated that he has excellent impulses. Cool and courageous, he has shrunk from the baser crimes, and, in fact, from one point of view, seems to have been influenced as a bushranger by something of the same sentiment as that which guided the Pirates of Penzance. When he rode after and overtook Mr. Gardiner, Mr. Gardiner had 2,000*l.* about him. He would not give it up; Captain Swift could not get it without using his pistol; so he rode away. If people did not surrender their property when asked to do so this bushranger went without. Wilding, however, keenly appreciates the peace and rest of the house in which he finds himself; he repents his ill-spent life, and on the whole we really cannot help wishing him prosperity. If the play were well devised, we should, on the contrary, be longing for his arrest, for the escape of Stella from the fate which threatens her, and for her reconciliation with Harry Seabrook.

The character of Wilding, it will be seen, is not well conceived for dramatic purposes. Mr. Beerbohm Tree makes him far too amiable. It is possibly a temptation to an actor to play a sympathetic part; but if Wilding is made sympathetic the plot goes. Mr. Tree's performance is full of clever touches; indeed he has done nothing of late years that has not been distinguished by tact and intelligence. For such a cool and collected master of his profession as we are told Captain Swift is, however, the actor perhaps a little over-emphasizes the starts and changes of expression when sudden references are made to his exploits or to bushrangers in general. When, in the last act, hunted by the detective and by his vengeful foster-brother, Wilding finds refuge in Gardiner's rooms (where he is kindly welcomed), the change of manner also struck us as unnecessarily pronounced. His bearing in the earlier acts seems more natural. There were excellent points here as elsewhere, nevertheless, one of the best being his direction to Gardiner to make Stella believe that he had never really loved her. The sincerity of his love is manifest as he speaks, and contradicts his utterance, and his motive is a noble and generous one. Lady Monckton's performance of Mrs. Seabrook was a very able piece of work. Her emotion in the presence of her deserted son, whom she sees for the first time, was true and deep, and her tenderness to her husband, who knows nothing of the dark secret of her early life, had great sincerity. Mr. Kemble's Seabrook was a pleasant study of the kindly old man who never suspects that something akin to a tragedy is working around him. Stella, in the hands of Mrs. Tree, becomes a delightfully winning and graceful girl. Miss Rose Leclercq exhibits with skill the air of a woman of the world whose chief desire it is to avoid unpleasantness and scandal, and whose cynicism is not devoid of humour. Mr. Macklin as the sturdy colonial Gardiner contributed much to the favourable reception which the play obtained, despite its crudities. The younger members of the Seabrook family, as played by Mr. F. Gillmore and Miss Agnes Miller, did not interest us much, we confess, though the gentleman is not without ability. The butler, Marshall, is a very extravagant conception; but Mr. Pateman made it as reasonable as circumstances allowed. Mr. Allan did what was necessary as the detective. The dialogue is rather good than bad; if there is nothing that strikes one very forcibly, there is nothing to call for adverse criticism, and there are decidedly clever points in the play. We cannot speak very favourably of Captain Swift as a whole. At the same time, and in spite of the mistakes that have been indicated, we regard it as a very promising work which shows its author to be possessed of dramatic instinct and aptitude.

At the Lyceum Miss Ellen Terry's exquisite acting grows upon one at a re-hearing; but unluckily this result is inverted as to the play, which, for fatuity, pretension, and feebleness, can scarce be matched. Mr. Calmour has taken an idea worthy of Mme. d'Aulnoy, and by his treatment has rendered it worthy—well, of Mr. Calmour. Miss Terry's acting is, indeed, like a rich jewel in an Ethiop's ear. Mr. Irving's Macaire has gained immensely since his first appearance with the present cast. His version of the swaggering, dandy, murderous, humorous ruffian, is a brilliant creation, and we are reminded of what an accomplished critic, now unhappily gone from among us, said on Mr. Irving's first appearance in the part at a matinée—"It is as good as Frédérick—sometimes better." Since then, however, the actor has added new and good touches. It might be fanciful to suppose that here and there one may find indications of a most amusing travestie of the favourite gestures of a well-known living French comedian.

The revival of the Mikado—one of the best, if not the best, of Gilbert and Sullivan's operas—will not fail to be a popular movement, especially as the Japanese craze is not yet even on the wane amongst us. Mr. Grossmith's Ko-Ko is as humorous as ever, and the sudden "flop" which, according to his amusing pianoforte sketch, provoked such curiosity as to how it was done, is as sudden. Mr. Temple is still inimitable as the Mikado, Mr. Barrington's "Pooh Bah" is excellent in acting, and his singing might be perfectly true, if he would only raise his voice consistently half a tone all through. Mr. Robertson as "Nanki-Poo" sings delightfully, and, when once he has conquered his self-consciousness, acts up to his part. Miss Brandram as Katisha is perfect. Her style of singing and her free action leave nothing to be desired. It is a pleasure to look at her and hear her, and all one wishes is that she had a wider scope for her powers. Miss Jessie Bond surpasses herself as "Pitti Sing," and makes her spirit of fun felt by her audience. Miss Ulmar as "Yum Yum" is not so satisfactory. Her intonation leaves to seek, and she acts at the audience instead of with her fellow-artists. Altogether, however, the Mikado revived is well worth going to see, for those who want to be amused and not harrowed at a theatre.

THE WAGNER SOCIETY AT PRINCE'S HALL.

AN interesting conversazione, with a programme of music, we need not say, chosen from Wagner's works, was given at Prince's Hall last Tuesday, by the Wagner Society. A temporary Society of that name existed, and gave concerts in the years 1873 and '74, with the object of contributing towards the building of the Bayreuth theatre. The scheme was revived in 1884 for the purpose of encouraging in every possible way the knowledge and appreciation of Wagner's works, half the profits now being devoted to the expenses of the performances at Bayreuth. The programme on Tuesday was a very successful one, with one exception—the insertion of the chorus of messengers in Rienzi between two scenes of the Götterdämmerung. Rienzi was one of Wagner's earliest works, written between 1838 and 1840, and hardly shows any sign of the great power of the master. The chorus sounded very feeble and trite next to the Götterdämmerung, which is one of his latest and most typical works, only completed in 1874, although we find the sketch of the Siegfried-Tod in 1848. Whatever is said against Wagner, no one can accuse him of hasty and ill-considered work; for, again, in the Meistersinger there were twenty-two years between the original idea and the completion of it in 1867. The conversazione began with the Spinning Chorus from Der Fliegende Holländer, the first work of his of evident promise, written in 1840. It was the outcome of a very unfortunate and disastrous journey between Riga and London, en route to Paris, in which Wagner was much struck by the genuine belief of the sailors in this weird legend. Then followed the first scene of the third act of the Götterdämmerung and the final scene, sandwiched, we think, so unfortunately by the Rienzi chorus. Two lovely gems for violin and orchestra came next, "Träume," a song composed and afterwards arranged for small orchestras by Wagner himself, with a motif from Tristan und Isolde running all through, and the well-known Siegfried Idyll adapted from his opera Siegfried. The evening's entertainment concluded with selections from the Meistersinger von Nürnberg, including the quintett, the "Preislied," and Hans Sachs's two famous monologues so lately heard at the Richter concerts, "Wie duftet doch der Flieder" and "Wahn! Wahn"! the philosophy of which shows so plainly Schopenhauer's influence over Wagner, acquired when in exile at Zürich and dominant all the rest of his life. As to the performance, on the whole, we thought it praiseworthy. We have so lately heard Mlle. Pauline Cramer at a Richter concert in the Brünnhilde scene, it is hardly fair to judge of her on Tuesday. Mr. Armbruster's accompaniments on the piano were excellent, but we miss the orchestra dreadfully, particularly as Mlle. Cramer does not quite know how to moderate her voice to suit her surroundings. Herr Carl Mayer won the palm of singing in the part of Sachs; he has a fine voice thoroughly well trained, and the small orchestra gave a lovely rendering of the "Träume" and Siegfried Idyll, first violin Herr Ludwig. The choruses were satisfactory, but again orchestral accompaniment was sadly wanted. No composer suffers more than Wagner by an imperfect performance of his works, his whole theory being based on a complete tout ensemble. As an example of his care of every detail, he generally writes parts for at least four individual wood-wind instruments, instead of depending for a complete chord on the combination of several different kinds—i.e. flutes, oboes, clarinets, and bassoons—thus making possible an infinite variety of tone and timbre. We cannot help also thinking it a great mistake, and giving a most inadequate idea of his works and genius, to render excerpts of his operas with neither scenic effect, dramatic action, or orchestra. Wagner's whole life ought to be known before a hasty judgment is pronounced of either him or his works. It was a series of almost uninterrupted misfortunes up to 1864, when the late King of Bavaria, Ludwig II., even before his mind became quite unhinged on the subject, took him up so nobly and generously. The episode in Wagner's life of the Revolution of 1849 has been grossly exaggerated, like many other facts about him. His principal object then and always, attempted, it is true, by sadly mistaken methods, was the regeneration and freedom of art.

MULTUM IN PARVO.

[A pleasant interlude in the business proceedings of the General Conference on Foreign Missions was the holding of a garden party at Dollis Hill, the residence of the Earl of Aberdeen. . . . There were loud cries for a speech from Mr. Gladstone; but the right hon. gentleman declined to accede to the request, despite an urgent appeal to "Say only five words." Mr. Gladstone, however, made amends by standing on the lawn a considerable time, vigorously shaking the hands of hundreds of visitors who pressed forward.]

"ONLY five words." A modest prayer!
If that would have contented,
You, with so many words to spare,
Might surely have assented.

"Good afternoon, my Christian friends,"
Or "Glad his Lordship asked you,"
Or "Ayr a cheering message sends,"
Would have but lightly tasked you.

You might have found five words to say
On weather, one supposes,
As "Such a lovely summer day!"
Or "What a June for roses!"

Or, in a somewhat graver strain,
"Good speed to foreign missions!"
Or "Have you seen"—in lighter vein
Of talk—"the Exhibitions?"

It may be that you scorned the phrase
Of light colloquial prattle,
And wished in your five words to raise
Some party cry of battle.

Yet, if you thought the admiring crowd
Were all of your persuasion,
Why grasped you not the chance allowed?
Why seized you not the occasion?

When Dr. Taylor from the States,
In homage quite romantic,
Declared your welcome compensates
A voyage across the Atlantic,

Why did you not the presence hail
Of that distinguished meeting,
To give your friends the Clan-na-Gael
Five words of friendly greeting?

"Three cheers for P-tr-ck F-rd" would do,
And suit that purpose nicely;
"More power to Eg-n's elbow!" too
Would put the case concisely.

But why five words? When, if you turn
Your whole attention to it,
And breathe your soul in words that burn,
We know that two will do it.

Two words sufficed, your country saw,
So rich your tongue's resources,
To hound the enemies of law
Against its scattered forces.

Two words sufficed, with no pretence
Themselves to force or beauty,
To nerve the arm of Violence,
And chill the heart of Duty;

To trip the feet that trod the road
To Order, scarce yet steady;
To fire the savage blood that glowed
For its revenge already.

And if that pair of words well-known
Were for such offspring married,
If your "Remember Mitchelstown!"
Such deadly meaning carried,

Who knows—unless the other three
Were merely useless lumber—
What potent issues we might see
From more than twice their number?

REVIEWS.

THE LONG WHITE MOUNTAIN.*

MR. JAMES seems to have inherited somewhat of the spirit of those chroniclers of the middle ages who thought it necessary to begin every historical record with the Flood. The account of his "journey in Manchuria" occupies only a small portion of his massive volume; the remainder he has filled with a history of the country and its inhabitants since the time that the Manchus took shape as a nation, as well as with a sketch of the present Manchu dynasty of China. This is much as if a Chinese traveller in Scotland were to preface his narrative by an account of the history of Great Britain since the union of the two crowns. But Mr. James considers that the fact that "from a valley on the outskirts of the Long White Mountains there sprang a petty Tartan chieftain nearly three hundred years ago who challenged the power of China, and whose sons, after a determined struggle, conquered the Celestial Empire and placed on the throne the present dynasty," is sufficiently astounding to justify a full relation of the events which led up to and followed it. But surely this is an incident of a kind with which we are familiar not only in Oriental, but also in European history. The hardy inhabitants of Northern inhospitable climes have always found in the plains of the sunny South irresistible attractions and scenes of easy conquest. The invasions into Southern Europe of the Goths and into India of the Aryans have found their counterparts over and over again in Chinese history. Ever since the time that She Hwangte found it necessary to build the great wall to defend himself against the encroachment of the Huns, wave after wave of invasion has swept over the country from the North, sometimes led by Mongolian, sometimes by Turkish, and sometimes by Manchurian chieftains. The advent to power, therefore, of the present dynasty was but one of a long series of similar episodes.

The complete control eventually gained by the invaders over the people of the conquered country harmonizes also with the past history of the Chinese. With them there is no such thing as personal loyalty to a sovereign. They are content to know nothing of him who reigns over them, and are ready to yield implicit obedience to the throne in the abstract so long as peace and plenty are secured to them.

But, though we cannot agree with Mr. James in regarding the historical portion of his work as called for, we are ready to admit that he has succeeded in making it very readable, and that there is much in it which will be both new and interesting to most of his readers. But, as we have no desire to imitate Mr. James's prefatial voluminousness, we will pass on at once to the account of his journey.

In company with Lieutenant Younghusband, of the King's Dragoon Guards, he determined to spend a portion of a long Indian leave in travelling in Manchuria, and, in pursuance of this intention, he landed at Yingtzü, the port of Newchwang, in May 1886. Here, fortunately for the travellers, they met Mr. Fulford, of the China Consular Service, who agreed to accompany them, and whose knowledge of Chinese was of inestimable advantage to them throughout their journey. At Yingtzü they stayed just long enough to provide themselves with six carts and the requisite servants, and then struck northwards into the almost unknown regions of Manchuria. On the subject of this name Mr. James makes the not very profound remark that it is "unknown to the Chinese, having, as far as I can ascertain," he adds, "been coined by French geographers." It would have been indeed strange to have found a Latinized name in use among the Chinese, with whom we should as soon have expected to find the name of Confucius domiciled as that of Manchuria. Mr. James is an Indian civilian, and we should have thought the analogies suggested by the names Arabia, Persia, India, &c., would have at once occurred to him when he set about trying to ascertain something about the name Manchuria. As a matter of fact, the country called by us Manchuria was originally known to the Chinese as Suhshên. This name subsequently became Chushên, and was changed by Nurhachu, the founder of the present Chinese Imperial line, to Manchu, meaning Pure. By a mistake of Chinese scribes, the second syllable was converted into "chow," a word which means "a territory," and hence the designation of Manchow, which is now commonly applied to the country.

From Yingtzü the travellers went direct to Mukden, the capital —a fine city, with splendid walls forming a square about a mile long each way. Like every sign of civilization in Manchuria, Mukden dates its existence from the rise to power of Nurhachu at the end of the sixteenth century. The city was founded by him, and it was within its walls that he exchanged his travelling-pack for a chieftain's robe. In the archives of the city are still preserved the boots which he wore and the pack which he carried in his struggling days; and, in striking contrast to these evidences of his early poverty, stands outside the wall the imperial mausoleum which holds his ashes, and which is surrounded with every emblem of sovereignty. The temple which serves as the antechamber to the tomb is roofed with yellow imperial tiles; the principal gateway is flanked on either side by bas-reliefs in green majolica, representing imperial five-clawed dragons; while huge stone lions guard the sacred portal. Besides these relics of the nation's hero there is not much that is worth seeing in Mukden, and after a few days' rest, therefore, the travellers started for the grand object of their journey, the Long White Mountains, which lie nearly due east from Mukden, at a distance by road of about four hundred and fifty miles. It must be understood that here, as in a great part of Manchuria, the word "road" is not to be regarded as a strictly descriptive term. "Track," or "pathway," would more nearly define the kind of "road" the travellers traversed; but the sight of the Long White Mountains, the fabled cradle of the Manchu race, and the scene of the miraculous birth of Nurhachu, made them forget the miseries of their travel, including even the horrors of the wayside inns and the tortures endured from the myriads of gadflies which haunt the Machurian forests.

Legend has always affirmed that embosomed on the summit of the highest mountain of the range is an azure lake of unfathomable depth, where Olympian goddesses are wont to lave their limbs. Here on one occasion, so runs the story, three nymphs were disporting themselves when a passing magpie dropped a fine ripe fruit into the embrace of the one named Fokolun. Unconscious of the nature of the gift, the goddess ate the fruit, by virtue of which she became pregnant, and in due time gave birth to a boy of godlike appearance and heaven-born attributes. Like so many infants renowned in Oriental and classical histories, this youthful prodigy was cast adrift in a canoe on a neighbouring river. In accordance with precedent, also, he so impressed the people of the district where his barque touched shore that they adopted him as their ruler.

So far as the existence of the lake and the beauty of the colour of its water are concerned, Mr. James, who with his companions are the only Europeans who have ever invaded the precincts of the sacred pool, fully bears out the legend. A further object which Mr. James had in view in visiting Manchuria was to ascend a range of snowy peaks, ten to twelve thousand feet high, which map-makers have, with that persistency in error which is one of their characteristics, always laid down in the neighbourhood of the Ch'angpai shan. But a careful survey of the surrounding country revealed to him the fact that this range which "lifts its head and lies" on almost every map of Manchuria, including one issued not very long ago by the Royal Geographical Society, is non-existent. But, apart from the Long White Mountain, there is little of geographical interest in Manchuria, nor did Mr. James meet with any archæological remains worthy of remark. In fact, Manchuria is mainly, if not entirely, interesting in a political sense. It forms one of the buffers between Russia and China, and may very possibly at some future time be the Belgium of Eastern Asia. We should have been glad, therefore, to have heard something more than Mr. James is able to tell us of the military dispositions which the Chinese are making for the defence of the frontier. Of the arsenal at Kirin he speaks in high praise. "It was very interesting," he writes, "to see a large establishment filled with foreign machinery, some German and some English, with boilers and engines, and steam-hammers, just as one might see at Woolwich or Elswick, all erected and managed by Chinese without foreign assistance of any kind." And it is satisfactory to know that "the Chinese verdict on English compared with German machinery was that the latter worked more quickly and did delicate work better, but the English was more solid, and could always be depended on for accuracy."

Both at Kirin and elsewhere the Chinese appeared to be fully alive to the strategical importance of Manchuria—far more so, indeed, than the representatives of the European Powers at Peking, who have not troubled themselves to acquire any accurate and scientific knowledge either of the geography of the country or of the military position of the province. Considering the immense European and especially English interests which are at stake in China and the Far East, it is passing strange that our legation at Peking should be left without a military attaché, and that we should be dependent on news filtered through Russia, or on long-delayed announcements in the Peking Gazette, for information on movements which might at any moment seriously affect our commerce.

On the two subjects which Prince Kung once sententiously pointed out as being injurious to our interests in China—namely, opium and missionaries—Mr. James has much to say; and his opinion, as being that of an Indian official whose attention had already been necessarily directed to them, is of value. On the subject of opium he does not share the views of the Anti-Opium Society. Indeed, he regards it as "one of God's good gifts," to be enjoyed like wine and tobacco, and contrasts the effect of dram-drinking with that of opium-smoking, very much to the disadvantage of drink. "Half a dozen streets in London," he considers, "contain far more blear-eyed, sodden cumberers of the earth, men made originally in God's image, than the streets of all the towns in Manchuria." This comparison, as Mr. James would probably be the first to admit, is rather rhetorical than convincing, and its effect is partly destroyed by his statement that "the passion for it [opium-smoking] seems to exceed even the craving for drink. In the case of the rich, who can afford to buy it," he adds, "it is only the individual that suffers; but when a poor man is the victim, he will sell house, home, lands, and cattle, even wife and children, to gratify his appetite, and every winter unhappy wretches are found frozen to death, who have parted with their very garments to satisfy their craving. . . . No one would willingly allow a young man in whom he took an interest to begin it if he had sufficient influence to prevent him." In reading this, one would imagine that he was speaking rather of a present out of Pandora's box than of "one of God's good gifts."

On the subject of missionaries Mr. James's views are wise and temperate, and if among the zealous supporters of the different Christian creeds and sects in China there were more men like him, Prince Kung might withdraw his ban, and the missionary-protecting gunboats might be laid up in ordinary.

GEOMETRICAL TEACHING.*

SINCE an Association was formed, some fifteen years ago, for the improvement of geometrical teaching we have had frequent occasion to note the appearance of good text-books, and, therefore, infer some corresponding advance in the methods of instruction. The Germans, however, had preceded us in this new development of geometrical teaching, and we adhere to the opinion already expressed that, if the older system, as exemplified by Euclid and Legendre, must be superseded, then an English adaptation of such elementary works as the "Planimetrie" and the "Stereometrie" of Dr. Hermann Schumann would probably better serve the interests of the Association than their own Syllabus. Another recent extension has been in a direction which the orthodox geometer seems fated to ignore—the use of graphic methods, the actual details of the construction or delineation of curves from given data, so as to exhibit truly their nature and properties, and in certain cases give practical as well as mathematical solutions of engineering and other problems. In reading the geometry of Conics, for example, what beginner has not writhed over the false perspective under which the sections are frequently shown? the only satisfactory way, till the Quaternions of Hamilton be adopted, being to refer any solid under discussion to two rectangular planes. The ability to combine a plan with the corresponding elevation once attained, there is no difficulty in exactly setting forth on the plane of the paper any point or line on the surface of the solid.

Some years ago Professor Tait, in reviewing the two works written by Sir W. Rowan Hamilton, which he qualified as "only to be compared with such books as the Principia of Newton and the Méchanique Céleste of Lagrange," pointed out that, in developing his new method of mathematics, the inventor of Quaternions found himself compelled to fall back upon the Newtonian fluxions and reject the calculus of Leibnitz. This may be bracketed with the fact that some of the most able recent works on the Differential of Functions are formally and logically founded on the "method of Rates or Fluxions," distinctly a revived departure, returning to the employment of Newton's conception in order to avoid the use of infinite series which is necessarily involved in Lagrange's derived functions.

The Geometry in Space of Mr. Nixon, Royal Academical Institution, Belfast, has recalled the Quaternion calculus, which was really an extension of the geometrical method of Des Cartes without the artifice of co-ordinate axes. Mr. Nixon, however, introduces no new method, but in continuation of his former works now presents us with an excellent text-book of Solid Geometry under the above rather inadequate title. Surely all geometry has to do with space, whether the subject under consideration have three dimensions or less than three. The work is founded professedly on Euclid's Eleventh and Twelfth Books, but none of the propositions of the latter are set forth, though nearly all those of the former appear.

* Geometry in Space. By R. C. J. Nixon. Oxford: Clarendon Press. 1888.

Four-fifths of the book consist of original or compiled matter, which amply compensate for that omission, and constitute a comprehensive and thoroughly methodic course of instruction in polyhedra and solids of revolution, followed by a well-written chapter on the perspective of solids. In the third chapter we note the theorems of Guldinus proved, and discussion of surface spherics, with some interesting extensions of the modern plane geometry, such as centres and axes of similitude, radical planes and centres, poles and polar planes. The proofs throughout are models for condensation and clear arrangement, assisted by diagrams which are in all respects almost perfect. Exception might be taken to the definition on page 46, since the lateral faces cannot be formed by the lines joining the corners. A valuable feature of this book is the choice of exercises; those on the chapter on polyhedra, for example, leading up to a most interesting set of properties of an orthogonal tetrahedron, analogous to a well-known group in plane geometry. The nine-point-circle (also called "medioscribed" by Dr. Mackay) of a triangle now becomes the twelve-point-sphere of the tetrahedron. The radius of the twelve-point-sphere is one-third that of the circum-sphere, and (to quote one of many other properties) the twelve-point-sphere, the circum-sphere, and the sphere whose surface passes through the six mid points of the edges, all have a common radical plane.

Mr. Nixon offers a good example to many recent writers by appending to his book a comprehensive index, and giving the reader hints here and there as to the source of valuable theorems and generalizations. Such "historical notes," as Dr. J. S. Mackay terms them in his edition of Euclid, are of great interest to every mathematician, because "the names of those who have extended the boundaries of science should not be unknown to those who inherit the results of their labour."

"SILLY SUFFOLK."*

DR. EMERSON has once again been studying man and nature through the medium of his camera, and has published the record of his experience in another goodly volume—Pictures of East Anglian Life the highly respectable name of it. The great fault of the book is that, being full of text, it is too large to read with comfort or advantage. It is the type of volume which has no real existence apart from a reading-desk, and is best described as "a portfolio in disguise." Ourselves have struggled with it, and not been vanquished; but the grapple was of necessity close and deadly, and a result of it has been to induce in us a certain regard of unfriendliness to the author. It is impossible, indeed, to do oneself justice both as a writer and a photographer on a large scale in the confines of one and the same pair of boards. The photographer is safe enough, but the writer must inevitably suffer. The reader, fatigued by wrestling with unwieldiness, is apt to grow captious, and to think worse of such faults as he may light upon in the course of his long and toilsome endeavour than, it may be, they deserve. Perhaps it is for this reason, and perhaps it is for another; but it is, at any rate, certain that Dr. Emerson's style produces an impression of being both slovenly and inexpressive, while his arguments and conclusions get to sound suspiciously like special pleadings. His attitude is not at all unlike that of Canning's Friend of Humanity. "Did some rich man," one seems to hear him saying, "tyrannically use you?"—

> Was it the squire, or parson of the parish?
> Or the attorney?

He cares nothing for the parson, and as little for the squire. He japes upon them with his own japes and with the japes of others; he loves to contrast their condition with that of his friends and authorities, the long-shore man and the farm-labourer; he goes the length (we are afraid) of rejoicing when they are taken in, and of regarding the greedy hypocrisy of his authorities and friends aforesaid with a certain pride. And the odd thing is that his picture of the particular set of peasantry which he has made it his business to study for the once is as unflattering and unpleasant as has ever been painted. In "Silly Suffolk" has he learned his lore; and, if his hypotheses be sound, the enthusiasm which he professes for the denizens of that pleasant county is the least explicable of mysteries we know.

The peasantry with whom Dr. Emerson is immediately concerned are those round about Southwold. He is careful to note that his observations apply to no other district, and to remark upon the curious and inherent differences presented by the inhabitants of contiguous parishes. He starts with the admission that the Southwold man is either abusive and dishonest or honest and civil at will, and in proportion as he thinks he will be the gainer. Should it occur to him that he will profit by being a rascal and a brute, then a brute and a rascal he is; while he has but to opine that honesty is a better policy, to put his theory into practice with all imaginable frankness and politeness. The admission is a great deal for a professed and resolute sympathizer to make; and it is characteristic of Dr. Emerson that he forgets, a couple of pages further on, that he has made it, and proceeds to describe the petite bourgeoisie of Suffolk as "the most despicable class in the county," forasmuch as "having all the bad qualities of the peasantry, they are in addition mean-spirited toadies and grovellers for the sake of filthy lucre." The difference between these miserable wretches and the free and independent characters whose "object is, as a rule, to do or say exactly what will be most to their own advantage," whose life is spent in "besting" or being "bested" by each other, and who can put off the habit of frankness and honest dealing for one of cunning and double-dealing at a moment's notice, is too subtle, as it appears to us, to be apprehended of the unfanatical mind. "The ruling passion of the peasantry," confesses our author, "is avarice"; their "envy towards each other is intense, and they jealously avoid imparting information to one another"; they "would rather see a horse kill a man than tell him how to manage it." They are perfect in the art of simulating poverty, and will ask and take any amount of alms so long as they are allowed to call it "largesse." In bearing witness they are careful to give according as they have received; for "if previously bought over, they cunningly frame their answers according to instructions," while they "refuse to speak at all until paid to do so." They are careful of their persons, and would rather scold, than fight out, a quarrel. They are "not servile," but, for all that, "their outward respect for the local squirearchy" is such as to fairly "disgust," not only the gipsies in general, but "many a travelling showman"—the travelling showman being, it appears, together with the gipsy, "the great disseminator of Radical doctrines." For the rest, they are hideously cruel to birds and animals and each other; they are greatly addicted to brag and tittle-tattle; they have no objection to a little gambling; they are by no means averse from the consumption of liquor; they are poachers as often as they dare; they despise the Establishment; they are superstitious to the last degree; they are respectful of Dissent, and exist but to swindle the "passon" and the squire; they hate and despise the farmer class; they are fast turning from Blue (the true blue of Toryism) to a consistent Yellow (the yellow of the hopeful and esurient Radical); they aspire—as to a kind of millennium—to the "nationalization" of everything, and cherish as an ideal the advent of a time when the Commune will be society, and everybody will be helped by everybody else, and the aged and infirm will be kicked out into solitude to expire as best they can, and so relieve the body politic of the care of tending and supporting them. Dr. Emerson, when he comes to think seriously of their condition, is, to speak soothly, a little depressed about it. He seems, however, to think that their regeneration is possible, and in his mind's eye he has a vision of its achievement at the hands of a corps of noble, but self-conscious, "Bohemians," who shall live among them, and persuade them of their duties, and teach them to prefer the publications of the Kyrle Society to the wares of the travelling hawker, and the "sweet reasonableness" of the good Radical voter to the servile dissembling of the man accustomed to swindle the "passon," and bow down (while there is anything to be made by it) before the local squire. But Dr. Emerson is a little vague in his ideals as he is a trifle loose in his statements, and to the average mind the practices and influences of his "Bohemians" are, on the face of them, no more than visions and dreams of the night. What is certain is that, having convicted his peasants of every sort of meanness of which the human composition is capable, he has added a new terror to experience by darkly hinting at the existence in Suffolk of a worse lot still; even the great body of "farmers and petits bourgeois"—or, in other words, "the most despicable class in the county." It is a pity that he gives no facts in proof of this latter theory. We have seen the worth of his demonstration of the merits and the general "interestingness" of one particular class. One would not be sorry to ponder the results of his impeachment of another. If we add that he has "defended" the fisherfolk of his district in the same terms and to the same purpose as the peasants, we shall probably have said enough.

After all, however, the main interest of his book lies, not so much in his presentment of the manly virtues of the Suffolk peasant and the claims to imperial influence of the Suffolk "beachcomber," as in the pictures which, his good camera aiding, and a profound contempt for the miserable wretches who presume to "arrange" and attempt the "improvement" of nature guiding, he has produced for our special enlightenment. It should be noted in this connexion that he prefers Crome to Constable, and is of opinion that, being deficient in "tone," the pictures of the latter artist are generally lacking in "atmosphere"; and it should be added that, being familiar with the works of J. F. Millet—or, at all events, with such of them as are reproduced in Sensier's "admirable life" of that great man—he has sought, as we imagine, to "compose" his photographs of East Anglian life so as to suggest the presence of a certain "Millet quality" in their originals. Now and then, as in "A Stiff Pull" and "In the Barley Harvest," both capital subjects capitally treated, he has been successful enough to make us wish that Millet had painted in Suffolk instead of at and about Chailly-en-Bière. In another plate, "The Farm by the Broad," he contrives to give us something of the effect of (as it were) the raw material of a Corot. In "A Suffolk Shrimper 'Going Out'" and "A Suffolk Shrimper 'Coming Ashore'" he reminds us a little of Mesdag; in other plates—flat, airless, valueless—of the followers of Bastien-Lepage. This is as much as to say that, if he were a painter, he would not have published his photographs, but would have tried to convert them into pictures. As he is not a painter, he appears to cling to the delusion that art is a representation of nature, and that a photograph, which tells everything seen by the camera, is, ipso facto, superior to a picture, which only tells what the painter has chosen to see and represent. From his own point of view the result is scarce, perhaps, so exalting and imposing as he might have wished. From that of his readers it is extremely interesting. Art is one thing, of course, and photography is another; and these photographs of Dr. Emerson's are a good deal less like art—though, as we have seen, they are not lacking in suggestions of it—than some others we have seen. But they show what the camera perceived with excellent explicitness; they are so much nature taken in the fact—so many documents in illustration of Suffolk scenery and the Suffolk character; and as such they will (no doubt) be welcome to a great number of persons to whom their correlatives in art would be merely insignificant.

AN ASSIZE IN LOWER BENGAL.*

ARCHDEACONS who dabble in the levying of the Excise in India, and omniscient members of Parliament who weep over the Salt-tax or pass judgment on the procedure of Indian tribunals, very soon get out of their depth. It is perfectly correct to say that the decision of statesmen who have had no previous Oriental training may turn out perfectly sound on what are termed Imperial questions in India, China, and the East. But such men consult experts, by whom they are admirably aided, and they make up their minds cautiously, constructing a policy out of a mass of conflicting opinions and evidence. The clerical and the Parliamentary censor, on the other hand, may completely miss the significance of the ordinary proceedings in any revenue or judicial tribunal, and may distil acidity out of sweetness and get darkness out of light. We draw these conclusions from the following analysis of a trial at a Bengal Sessions, which, with imperturbable gravity, the publisher or editor terms "a Romance of Criminal Administration." The reader might imagine that he was about to hear some deliciously prurient revelations about the mysteries of the Zenana, the woes of Begums, the revenge of angry lovers, the rise and fall of favourites, and the domestic lives of Eastern kings. The story, on the contrary, is one of the most prosaic kind. It is an account of the death of a young girl in a quiet village in one of the most populous districts of Lower Bengal, of an inquiry by the police, of two trials at the Sessions Court, with a reference to the High Court between the first and the last trial, and of the ultimate acquittal of the accused. But though curious and interesting, we draw from it conclusions rather different from those drawn by the member for Aberdeen.

A certain Mohammedan named Muluk Chand was Chaukidar or watchman in the village of Bhulat, in the subdivision of Bongong, more correctly Bāngrām, in the well-known district of Nadiya. This man had a wife and two daughters. One morning in March 1882 the eldest, Nekjan, or the "Good Life," was found dead at a little distance from the pallet or bed on which she had been sleeping, near her father and her sister Golak Mani. The villagers were soon aroused; the police were informed; an incised wound was discovered of a triangular form in the "epigastric region," as the post-mortem report puts it; and while it was stated that the deceased had died from the bite of a snake, this story was disbelieved, and the father was eventually committed to stand his trial at the Sessions Court for the murder of his own daughter. The trial was held before a jury, charged in the usual way by the judge, the late Mr. Perceval D. Dickens. The chief witness against the prisoner was his surviving daughter, Golak. This girl, aged seven years, deposed that awaking just as it was getting light, she then saw her father with his foot on her sister's throat, striking her on the body with a spear. A functionary, who in one place is called the native doctor and in another the assistant at the Hospital of Bongong, deposed to the effect that he had examined the corpse, that he did not think that the child had been strangled, that the wound in the stomach was such as might have been caused by a spear produced in court, and that it was sufficient to cause death. The wife of the prisoner, who, it seems, had gone on the previous evening by her husband's direction to get some funds required for a certain litigation, gave evidence that, on her return the next morning, she found one daughter dead and her husband and the surviving child in tears, and that she taxed the prisoner with the murder. The evidence of neighbours and policemen as to this state of things was much to the same effect. The Civil Surgeon of the station of Kishnagar, who had never seen the corpse, stated that, from the report of his subordinate the native doctor, the child seemed to have been killed either by suffocation or by the shock occasioned by the spear wound. The prisoner himself, who, under the Criminal Procedure Code, was very properly examined both by the Magistrate and by the Sessions Judge, protested his innocence, and added that towards the morning of the night in question he had gone out to look after his garden of onions, that on his return he found his daughter lying dead, and that he suspected no one, though he had a quarrel with two other neighbours, Mohammedans like himself. The judge reviewed the whole evidence, carefully pointed out a motive for the crime in the suggestion that the prisoner murdered his own daughter in order to have grounds for getting his adversary into trouble, but added that the motive was slight; and then, laying stress on the evidence of the only eye-witness to the fact, the little girl aged seven, on the behaviour of the prisoner as hardly consistent with innocence, on the improbability of the story of the snake-bite, and on the weakness of the defence, evidently charged for a conviction. The jury unanimously found the prisoner guilty. Under the Anglo-Indian system all capital sentences passed at Sessions by District Judges are referred to the High Court of the various Presidencies for confirmation; and here the omniscience of the M.P. is unhappily at fault. He talks of the High Court as sitting "in appeal" in this case, and contrasts the criminal procedure of India with that of our English law courts, much to the discredit of the latter. Now, as we have just said, the decision of the Sessions Court was referred by the presiding officer proprio motu to the High Court, and was not appealed against at all. By the Indian Code two judges of the High Court are always required to confirm any sentence of death passed by any Sessions Court. The whole file of papers is at once sent up to the Registrar, who lays it before a Divisional Court. That court retries the whole case, as it were, on the record from beginning to end; counsel can be heard on both sides; and the prisoner is either sentenced to death or acquitted. On this occasion the prisoner's counsel was Baboo Man Mohan Ghose, a native gentleman of whom we have heard much in other quarters, and who, we are bound to say, brought out the facts in favour of the innocence of his client very forcibly and well. Of the presiding judges, one was a Barrister and the other a Civilian judge. It was shown to them that the evidence of the child-witness was possibly tutored or manifestly unreliable; that the wound must have been clumsily inflicted by the spear after death, in order to give colour to the story of the snake; that there was no adequate motive, nor indeed any motive at all, for a father to commit such a horrible crime; that in the charge to the jury some points had been unduly pressed and others disregarded; that alternative theories of the death were not duly propounded; that contradictions were glossed over; and that the main question whether any murder at all had been committed was really not present to the mind of the judge, and was not fairly laid before the jury. The Barrister-judge of the High Court, we remark, at first fell into the error of assuming that, because the evidence for the prosecution was not rebutted or was not subjected to a sharp cross-examination, therefore it could be disregarded. Now every Anglo-Indian official at all conversant with criminal or civil suits always asks himself, not whether such a one's evidence has been upset or analysed, but whether per se it is to be trusted at all. Cross-examination is a science of which most native advocates in the Courts of First Instance are entirely ignorant; and we recollect a very eminent and successful advocate at the close of his long Indian career saying that he should like to begin it again in the lowest Courts of the country, so that he might show Vakils and Mukhtars—native advocates and attorneys—how to cross-examine reluctant or eager witnesses. However, the High Court dealt with the whole case satisfactorily. Instead of getting the Government to depute a special judge to retry the case at Nadiya, they ordered it to be tried at Alipore, close to Calcutta, the prisoner and witnesses being brought there—some sixty miles—by rail. It is not necessary to go at length into the second trial, as the new judge did. The witnesses were re-examined at greater length and to far greater purpose. It was shown that the police had been so impressed with the story of the snake-bite that they had dug up the floor of the house to see if they could find any such reptile, though this significant fact had been kept out of the first trial. Divers discrepancies and contradictions were noticed. Baboo Man Mohan Ghose appeared again, made a very good speech for his client, and proved incontestably, to our thinking, that the child Golak had been tutored up to the very hilt. The District Judge, Mr. A. C. Brett, summed up dispassionately; made mincemeat of the deposition of the constable; pointed out that there were grounds for thinking that the wife might have wished to get rid of her husband; and that in a mysterious case, where the actual cause of death was uncertain, it would not be right to convict. The jury at once acquitted the prisoner; and we have no doubt that they were perfectly right. The error at the first Sessions was that the judge did not ask the jury to consider whether there were good grounds for thinking that any murder had been committed. When a corpse is brought into the Station this is the first question asked by every expert police officer before he casts about to find any perpetrator of an alleged crime.

Mr. Hunter by his preface seems to have made some wonderful discoveries. He has been forced to the conclusion that in Bengal the police may still be corrupt; that children can be tutored, by threats or by the promise of sweetmeats, to swear away the lives of their parents; and that witnesses generally may be quite ready to commit perjury. With the easy confidence which has enabled agitators to lay down the law in regard to public meetings in Trafalgar Square, he finds fault with the Indian Evidence Act, passed when Mr. Justice Stephen was Legal Member of the Viceregal Council. He objects to a provision in that Statute which allows any former statement made by a witness relating to a fact at or about the time when the fact took place, or before any authority legally competent to investigate the same fact, to be given in evidence. This, he says, gives "an enormous scope to perjury," and enables the prosecution to multiply witnesses. Very likely it goes beyond the English rule; but its object was, and is, to prevent perjury, and to enable the Indian judge to detect it. The said statement, previously made, must refer to the same fact to which the witness on oath is deposing. It shows whether the witness has always told the same tale. It may corroborate or it may invalidate his sworn testimony. And it is made legal evidence because a first statement is less likely to have been tutored, because it is probably spontaneous, because it is more likely to be true than subsequent disclosures. At any rate it shows how the witness from the first dealt with the facts. Next, with curious inconsistency, Mr. Hunter finds fault with the Sessions Judge for not sending for the Police Diaries, as by the Criminal Procedure Code, revised and enacted as Act X. of 1882, he was empowered to do. These Diaries, by this last law, may be used in Court, not as evidence in the case, but to aid it in the trial. They may be of use for the police officer who wrote them, in order to refresh his memory; or for the Court itself, in order to test and confute the policeman. At any rate, all these departures from our own practice have the sanction of experts, who know that the best way of getting at the truth is to find out, under certain safeguards, what was done or said out of Court, and not merely to rely on smooth-spoken and plausible witnesses in it. Mr. Hunter appears to think that, if the late Mr. Dickens had admitted something and excluded something else, he would have discovered the perjury. By the way, there is no such crime as perjury known to the Indian Code. It is there defined as "giving false evidence." But, in truth, the first miscarriage was simply due to the fact that the judge summed up against the accused as a murderer, without satisfying himself and the jury that anybody had been murdered.

One plausible explanation of the death is that the little girl died from snake-bite, and that the father, being aware that some neighbours would only be too glad to charge him with a capital or any other offence, foolishly made a wound in the child's stomach, so as to give it the appearance of a bite. We cannot say that the native doctor showed much quickness of apprehension or that his observations are very pertinent. But a better explanation is given by the counsel for the defence, who, after the acquittal, elicited from the prisoner the following confession. He was awoke by a noise which he attributed to a strange bull that had been in the habit of eating his vegetables. He got up and hurled a heavy piece of wood in the direction of the noise, and then found, to his horror, that he had unwittingly killed his own daughter. On this supposition or the alternative of the snake everything becomes intelligible; and indeed the trial, so far from being romantic, is a dull matter-of-fact, such as has come and will come again scores of times under the cognizance of Magistrates and Judges all over Bengal.

The whole record, if to an M.P. it suggests doubts on the admissibility of evidence and sneers at the Home Secretary, is to us a wonderful photograph of the judicial system in Bengal. The very names of the parties involved, their habits, the report to the police, the arrival of the constable followed by the Inspector, the rapid decomposition of the corpse, the trepidation and confusion of the unhappy father, the testimony of the little girl so cleverly concocted as to deceive a judge and jury, are each and all eminently suggestive. Other points forcibly illustrate domestic and village life. Sir William Hunter, not the M.P. of that name, has just shown that in Bengal Proper—that is, in the districts where the Bengali and not the Urdu language is spoken—there are some eighteen millions of Mussulmans to seventeen millions of Hindus. Many of the former have adopted, or more likely have retained, Hindu phraseology, and are divided into castes. Golak, the name of the surviving daughter, is pure Sanskrit; and Mussulmans often bear the names of Madhu and Gopal, all derived from the same classical language. Not long ago, and in some tracts to this day, the Mohammedans of Bengal might have been correctly described as "something little better than a mongrel breed of circumcised, low-caste Hindus." The notion of the father, Muluk Chand, that a stray bull was eating his crop, suggests another well-known incident of village life. A pious Hindu in fulfilment of a vow buys and lets loose on society a bull, in the name of religion. In Benares these animals are positive pests from their numbers and obtrusiveness. In Bengal they roam in much fewer numbers over the whole country, devour impartially the crops of men of all creeds, and when they penetrate the recesses of purely Mohammedan villages, never emerge again but are speedily converted into beefsteaks. The progress of enlightenment amongst Hindus is illustrated by the dissection of a corpse by a native medical officer, by caste a Brahman. Fifty years ago to deal with a dead body in this way was pollution to a high-caste Hindu; and when a student of the Medical College in Calcutta, some time during the administration of Lord Auckland, was the first to boldly dissect a dead body in the presence of Englishmen and natives, the orthodox Hindus fled in horror and thought that the world was coming to an end. The suggestion of the snake reminds us of the thousands of deaths which annually all over India are said to have been caused by reptiles and wild beasts. But tigers and buffaloes and even wild boars have long ceased to infest villages in Nadiya. Snakes, and now and then drowning, are the only resources left to those who wish to hush up inquiries into awkward and mysterious deaths. The bed of onions which the father went out to visit reminds us of the favourite vegetable of Mussulmans; and the Kachu plant, in which a knife produced in court was discovered and which is described in a foot-note as the Arum colocasia, is a large-leaved plant of which the tuber is eaten, very much resembling our rhubarb in appearance. The native term, translated "cow-path," is, we apprehend, the Bhangar, or go-páth. It is a strip of land such as may be seen on the edge of all villages, on which the community tether their cows before the cutting of the harvest allows cattle to roam at will over the plain. It is probably a survival of the joint tenancy of village communities, now practically extinct in Bengal. The assertion of the prisoner that the police pierced his nails with the thorns of the date-tree, may or may not be true. But it shows a lingering belief in the old story that policemen do resort to torture in order to extract confessions; while the laxity of the investigation by members of that body, and the whole complexion of the case, are tolerably good proofs that the inhabitants of one of the most populous and civilized districts near the metropolis ought still to be subjected to strict English supervision, and are not quite fitted for the glorious privilege of Self-government. But after these admissions we have nothing but commendation to bestow on the action of the High Court of Calcutta. That with much inconvenience to the accused his innocence was established and a judicial murder prevented, is due in part to the native advocate, but mainly to that composite tribunal, made up of the old Supreme Court and the old Sudder Court, a legacy of genuine and constructive statesmanship bequeathed by the late Lord Halifax.

PORTRAITS OF CELEBRATED RACEHORSES.*

THE author of this work may well say in his preface that "in Vol. II., commencing with the few remaining horses of the last century, the interest begins to quicken, and goes on increasing till the end of Vol. IV. is reached." The third volume, with which we have now to deal, contains a large number of illustrations from the pictures of J. F. Herring, many of which are worth looking at as clever representations of thoroughbred horses, even apart from their interest as portraits. There are others by Marshall, Laporte, Hancock, Baringer, Ferneley, Davis, Smith, Corbet, Harry Hall, F. C. Turner, Herring junr., Abraham Cooper and others; but no impartial critic could refuse to give the preference to those by J. F. Herring. The letterpress is on a par with that of the preceding volumes. It seems to us a pity that the races and pedigrees are not reported in the manner usual in newspapers and Turf guides. It is impossible to make matter of this kind readable throughout, and it is far better to give it in tabular form than as a piece of continuous reading.

It would be impossible in a review of this length to criticize all the portraits seriatim, and as they are merely given in chronological order, we will venture to rearrange them according to their families and notice a few of the principal representatives of the latter. Looking through the names of the descendants of the Darley Arabian through Eclipse, we find two portraits of Sir Hercules, his great-great-grandson, foaled in 1826. He was a black, or black-brown, with a good many white hairs in his coat. Both his pictures make him out to have been very powerful. He seems to have had a remarkably short and strong back, with arched loins, very lengthy and muscular quarters, and excellent shoulders. As his blood runs in the veins of nearly every living racehorse of celebrity, his portrait is well worthy of careful study. Sir Hercules's most famous son was Irish Birdcatcher, who was foaled in 1833 and died in 1860 (by the way, is not Mr. Taunton in error when he states that his dam, who died in 1850, was bred in 1883?). There is a portrait of him by Harry Hall, and we congratulate Mr. Taunton on having selected this instead of the other well-known picture of the same horse; for while the latter is more spirited, it does not show his points so well. He had a particularly sensible and bloodlike, but not exactly pretty, head, with fine ears. His neck was graceful, but muscular. His shoulders were good, yet they were by no means his best point. He had great depth of girth; his back was very short and strong, his back-ribs were excellent, and his hips were rather high in proportion to his shoulders. He had lengthy, muscular, but not loaded quarters, and he carried his tail, which had some of the Sir Hercules white hairs at the root, rather high. His arms and second thighs were long and powerful, but he had not a great deal of bone below the knee. In colour he was a rich chestnut, with a wide blaze down his face and over his nose, and one white hindleg. If the portrait by Hancock of his own brother, Faugh-a-Ballagh, is to be trusted, there was much in common between them; but Faugh-a-Ballagh seems to have had a longer back. There is an excellent picture by Herring of Birdcatcher's celebrated son The Baron, a chestnut horse that won the St. Leger in 1845. He seems to have been a very handsome horse, with a small head, an evil eye (he was a bit of a savage), a light neck, faultless shoulders, immense girth, good loins, rather drooping quarters, very powerful thighs and arms, and forelegs which might have been none the worse for a little more bone. We look forward to seeing the portraits of his famous sons Stockwell and Rataplan in the volume that has yet to be published.

Few descendants of Eclipse have been more renowned than Touchstone, and most of the best horses in training have more than one strain of his blood. Herring's picture does not make him by any means the best-looking horse in the book; nor was he exactly what would be called a very handsome horse.

* Portraits of celebrated Racehorses of the Past and Present Centuries, in strictly Chronological Order, commencing in 1702 and ending in 1870, together with their respective Pedigrees and Performances recorded in full. By Thomas Henry Taunton, M.A. In 4 vols. Vol. III. From 1824 to 1842. London: Sampson Low & Co. 1888.

His head was all very well, although his ears were coarse; his neck was strong, and his shoulders were fair, but not remarkable; there was, however, plenty of depth below them. It was behind the saddle that he possessed his extraordinary power. Indeed, we do not think that Herring quite did justice to his second thighs, which, as the writer of this article has reason to know from a personal acquaintance with the splendid old horse, were developed to an almost preternatural extent. His picture could not show his curious habit of turning out his hocks and galloping very wide behind, or how desperately he pulled. He lived to be thirty, dying in 1861; whereas Birdcatcher, with whose descendants his stock has been so much crossed, died at the age of twenty-seven, in the previous year. There are two pictures of Touchstone's son Cotherstone. He looks a powerful and remarkably well-shaped horse, but rather long in the leg, and without much bone below the knee.

Among Eclipse's descendants through King Fergus we have a portrait by Ferneley of Velocipede, who was foaled in 1825 and died in 1859. He was a tall chestnut horse with a white blaze, a flesh-coloured nose, two white fetlocks and a white heel. Like his sire, Blacklock, he had a big, ugly, Roman-nosed head, set on to a light, weak-looking neck. His shoulders were moderate, but he had a grand back and quarters and great depth of girth and back ribs. His legs look good, but rather long and wanting in bone, and, as a matter of fact, his off foreleg gave way between the knee and the fetlock. He became the sire of King of Trumps, and his blood exists in Bendigo and in many horses now in training, including King Monmouth, Rose Window, and Veracity, the winner of the late Lincolnshire Handicap. Another son of Blacklock's was a far more successful sire. This was Voltaire, of whom we have only an unsatisfactory, foreshortened portrait which tells us nothing. His name occurs three times in the pedigree of the winner of this year's Derby. There is a good picture here, by Herring, of Voltaire's son, Charles XII., who won the St. Leger in 1839. His long and rather heavy head, in this picture, looks as if it had some of the Blacklock characteristics; but in two portraits of him by the same artist that were formerly in the possession of the writer of this review, his head was remarkably well-shaped and bloodlike. As a whole, he showed a great deal of quality, although he was rather long-backed and drooping in the quarters. As a three-year-old he was purchased for 3,000 guineas, and as a stallion he was sold for 50*l*. Another horse of the King Fergus blood, whose portrait we have here, was Priam, winner of the Derby in 1830. He is said to have been handsome, but he looks a terrible stilty peacock in his portrait. Even in those early days he fetched 1,000 guineas as a yearling. Of the same blood and by the same sire was Plenipotentiary, whose portrait is by A. Cooper. He was a beautifully made horse, with immense bone and power, yet no lumber. Ayrshire has some of his blood in his veins. There are two portraits by F. C. Turner of Eclipse's celebrated descendant, Harkaway, the sire of King Tom. Harkaway was "a pale, yellow, sorrel" with a white face. He had a big, ugly head, and it is wonderful that a horse so finely bred on both sides should have been so angular, leggy, and coarse. He was a marvellous mover in his gallop, and he won twenty-five races out of thirty-eight. After his withdrawal from the turf, some Americans sent to ask his price and whether he was still in work. "The price of Harkaway," replied his owner, "is six thousand guineas, and I hunt him twice or thrice a week." His grandson, Kingcraft, won the Derby in 1870. A picture is given us of Liverpool, a direct descendant of Eclipse through the line of that horse's son, Joe Andrews. If Liverpool's portrait by Harrington was like him, he must have been a very coachy-looking brute. There is a far better portrait, by Herring, of Sheet Anchor, another horse of the Joe Andrews blood, whose name may be found in the pedigree of Stuart, the winner of the French Derby and Grand Prix of this year. He was a horse of great bone and power, but heavy-shouldered and round-rumped.

In looking through the names of the descendants of the Byerly Turk, we find a portrait of Venison. This was one of the most beautiful horses ever bred. A better head, a better neck, a better back, better shoulders, quarters, or limbs, it would be hard to find, either in a picture or in real life. Unfortunately nearly all his stock were small, and his blood is not very common, at present, in first-class racehorses. Minting's great granddam, however, was his granddaughter, and his name occurs in the pedigrees of several winners of last year, among others, Exmoor, Oberon, Panzerchiff, Renny, and Blanchland. In the Byerly Turk line again, we have Bay Middleton. Herring gives him a heavy head on a light neck, long weak loins, good depth of brisket, and capital limbs. Both the winner of this year's Derby and Friar's Balsam, whom most people think would have won it if he had been well, have a strain of Bay Middleton's blood. Among the pictures of the Byerly Turk's descendants we have also one of the very handsome, although low-backed, Glencoe, the sire of Pocahontas, Stockwell's dam. One of the most celebrated of the Byerly Turk's family was Sweetmeat, the sire of Macaroni, Parmesan, and Carnival. In his picture by Herring he is represented with a pretty little head, straight and heavy shoulders, good loins and quarters, and very little bone. He got some excellent mares, and his blood is much liked by many breeders.

We will now turn to the blood of the Godolphin Arabian. One of the most famous of his descendants, as a stallion, was Melbourne. His picture in this work is by Harry Hall, and was taken when he was at the stud. He is said to have been one of the most lengthy horses ever trained, yet he had great depth and short legs. His crest was remarkably thin, and he stood over very much on his fore-legs. He had wonderful shoulders—none better are represented in this book—and his quarters and thighs were unexceptionable; but in Harry Hall's portrait his loins are scarcely his best point. The stallions Sterling and Petrarch inherited his blood.

There are a good many pictures of famous mares in this volume. Among the most interesting is one, by Herring, of Emma, the dam of Cotherstone and Mundig, both winners of the Derby, as well as of Mowerina, dam of West Australian. She was a long, low, short-legged mare, but high in the withers. The portrait of Queen of Trumps, winner of both the Oaks and the St. Leger, is an admirable specimen of a Herring. She was about the best of Velocipede's get, and her picture is one of great interest. Herring has drawn Beeswing, the dam of the famous Newminster, in her gallop, and she looks a very bloodlike, graceful mare, but rather light of bone. Another light-boned, yet good-looking mare, was Crucifix, of whom there is a picture by Turner. She had a very straight head, great depth of brisket, and drooping quarters. She won both the Two Thousand and the Oaks, and her name appears in the pedigrees of several successful horses now in training, among others in that of Chitabob, the winner of this year's Whitsuntide Plate of 5,000*l*. She was also an ancestor of the celebrated stallion Hermit. Ghuznee, who only stood 14 hands and 3 inches when she won the Oaks, has an awful-looking hock in Turner's picture, yet she appears full of quality, as we well remember she was in reality when a brood mare at the stud. The portrait by Tasker of the celebrated mare Alice Hawthorn is not a happy one. It is quite a libel upon a mare whose name is to be found in the pedigree of the redoubtable Ormonde himself, as well as in those of a whole host of other winners. It is greatly to be regretted that there should be no picture of Pocahontas, the dam of Stockwell; but we do not remember ever to have seen one. We will conclude our review by noticing the picture by Abraham Cooper of Little Wonder, a brilliant-coloured bay horse, who won the Derby in 1840, although he was only 14 hands 3½ inches in height. He had excellent shoulders, very high withers, great depth of girth and length of arm, and drooping but very powerful quarters, with his hind legs turned a good deal under him. We have only to add that no library of books on racing will henceforward be complete without Portraits of Celebrated Racehorses.

TWO BOOKS ON SCIENCE.

SOME teachers of physical science will welcome the Fundamental Principles of Chemistry, by Robert Galloway, M.R.I.A. (Longmans & Co.) It bears throughout evidence of considerable knowledge, both of the subject in its principal phases and of the proper side for one to approach it in order to be efficient as a class-instructor. The author, however, though professing to teach chemistry by a new method, does not explicitly set forth in what it consists; and, on examining his arrangement and treatment of the various classes of facts and laws of the science, we fail to detect much originality. In the preface we find a reference to the usual chemical text-books as being "mere compilations of unclassified facts," and therefore infer that the author cannot have seen all those that recent years have brought forth, and some of which we have had to notice favourably. The introduction is an account of the physical properties of bodies, especially in regard to certain chemical operations and properties, filtration being illustrated under porosity, the collection of gases under impenetrability, fractional distillation under heat, &c. The chapter on Chemical Affinity proceeds, after discussing compound substances and elements, to illustrate the interaction of different forms of matter by suitable experiments, the influence of heat and pressure, and the action of bases and acids. The general laws of chemical combination are enounced and illustrated in the following order—those of definite, equivalent, and multiple proportions; the law of volumes, with a glance at Dalton's theory of atoms; and the law of Avogadro. There are some valuable notes as to basic substances and the various forms of acids and acid anhydrides, with the most approved methods of preparing them. A long chapter is devoted to salts, their formation, properties, and classification. A serious defect in the work is that there is no index, especially as many important subjects occur which are not even named in the table of contents. We trust Mr. Galloway will correct this if a second edition is called for.

In Sunlight (Trübner & Co.) we find a survival of the reaction against scientific evidence which, a generation ago, was instinctively produced in many earnest minds affected by the religious bias. Some of the writer's conclusions, many of which are quite revolutionary as well as novel, are that light is a force distinct from heat, that its action is uniform, that "all the phenomena of earth" are under its control, and that, in short, it is the dominant force in the universe; secondly, that there is no proof of heat in the sun, or of "innate inherent heat in earth"; thirdly, that it is the "creative action" of light which "gave causes for igneous action," and that it "must have an endless circle" coming from the sun to vivify matter on earth and going back to renew the energy of the sun. By that process "material has been constantly given or attracted to organic forms." The author deals as trenchantly and decisively with the arguments and evidence of Laplace, Herschel, Huxley, Thomson, Lyell, Geikie, and others, as did

Alexander of Macedon with the Gordian knot. Even Mr. Lockyer and Professor Tyndall come in for a large share of his attention; followed by Professor Tait, Sir W. Dawson, and others; and, after passing all the recent speculations under review, he sums up with a manifest consciousness of victory all along the line. He flouts in the most absolute manner any arguments as to the antiquity of our earth which have been derived from the discovery of bone-caves, and informs us that "it is well to blot out from natural history the ingenious unnatural ideas that have been entered in its pages by clever men, and continued by those who pin their leading-strings to the aprons of those who wrote before them." In another place we read that the "present school of physics and cosmic action is on its trial," a dictum parallel in its boldness to the startling criticism passed upon constitutional government by the late Prince Consort. Destructive criticism, however, is not sufficient for the author of Sunshine. He would base a new theory of the universe on the "simple suggestion that light was the first cause of the creation of this earth, acting on a nebulous mass that held in it gases or material sensitive to, absorptive, and retentive of that light."

ASSYRIA.*

ALTHOUGH it is perhaps open to question whether the story of a nation can be found in the scraps of information concerning the deeds of a few monarchs, the scanty records of the rise, the wars, and the fall of a mighty Empire, and the theories of modern students, which, along with certain Biblical notices, make up nearly all our authorities for Assyrian history, no one will be inclined to quarrel with the decision that has led to the publication of this useful and carefully written volume. It contains in a convenient form the results of the investigations of Professor Sayce, Canon Rawlinson, M. Lenormant, and other eminent scholars into the signification of the Assyrian inscriptions and other monuments, and tells us all that is really known, and all that these scholars hold ought to be most surely believed, as to the history of the Empire. Nor is this all; for after discussing the rise of "Asshur," and making the most of the cylinder of Tiglath Pileser I., the only king of the "First Empire" who is much more than a name, Mr. Ragozin fills up a long gap in Assyrian history by two excellent chapters on the Canaanitic peoples, and especially the Phœnicians. The greatness of Assyria revived in the ninth century, and soon threatened the independence of the kingdoms of Syria and Israel. Notices of the campaigns of Shalmanesor II. and Tiglath Pileser II. during this period illustrate and fill up the Bible narrative; some comments will be found on the legend of Semiramis, and an ingenious attempt is made to reduce the story of Jonah's whale to an ordinary occurrence. Mr. Ragozin has an interesting chapter on the glories of the reign of Sargon, the conqueror of Samaria, who had completely "dropped out of history," until he was restored to his proper place by recent discoveries. The account of the rise of the Powers that brought about the "fall of Asshur" is too discursive; the Hittite monuments in Asia Minor, for example, are surely somewhat remotely connected with the siege of Nineveh by the Medes and Babylonians. The illustrations, with which the volume is liberally supplied, are well chosen and add greatly to its value.

THE FALL OF NEW FRANCE.†

IN an Introductory Note Mr. Hart states that this volume is in the main a paper read before the Historical Society of Montreal. He expresses the hope that it will be the forerunner of other books comprising lectures which have already been delivered at the sessions of the Society, and which will, he believes, together form a valuable history of the Dominion of Canada. Our colonies, as a rule, do not offer a favourable field to the historian; but with Canada it is otherwise. The establishment and growth of our North American colony has been marked by several dramatic incidents and political problems worthy of more detailed consideration than they have hitherto received. We might have wished that Mr. Hart had expanded his lecture, so as at once to have rendered it more comprehensive and to have avoided the tediousness which results from excessive brevity, and which has caused the opening pages of his narrative to be little more than a catalogue of names and facts. In this respect Parkman, in his Montcalm and Wolfe, has the advantage over Mr. Hart.

But although we regret the shortcomings of this sketch of the destruction of French authority in Canada, Mr. Hart, in publishing his lecture as it was given, instead of shaping it into a consecutive and substantial work, is only following the example of several illustrious English professors. There are two sections of this volume, comprising together the greater part of its substance, which are well considered and will well repay the reading. The events of the war which resulted in the capture by the English of Quebec and Montreal in 1760 are described in an interesting and accurate manner; and the causes which led up to the expulsion of the French colonists from Acadia, now called Nova Scotia, are clearly and forcibly traced.

The French Canadians since the foundation of our colony have proved a source of trouble to English rule in Canada; and now, great in numbers and with influence greater than their numbers justify, they threaten constant danger to the unity of the Dominion. Of such importance is the French question to the well-being of Canada that we should have been glad if the narrative of this volume had been carried up to date. It is almost impossible to obtain a candid opinion on the subject. Canadian politicians have to consider the French Canadian vote, and, though Mr. Hart writes as President of an Historical Society, yet he also avoids with malice prepense hinting his view of so delicate a problem. In our Colonial Empire every decently educated man is a politician in embryo. What does appear most clearly from Mr. Hart's narrative is that we have all along treated our French subjects with an excess of consideration, to the serious detriment of colonists of our own nationality. Our dealings with the French inhabitants of Acadia, against which much ignorant feeling has been excited by Longfellow's Evangeline, were marked by vacillation which, however humanely intended, involved us in considerable difficulties, and well-nigh exposed us to such danger as might effectually have prevented the maintenance of our supremacy in Canada. Section XIV. of the Treaty of Utrecht, under which the province was ceded to England, was definite enough in its provisions:—"The subjects of the said King (of France) may have liberty to remove themselves within a year to any other place, as they shall think fit, together with all their moveable effects. But those who are willing to remain there are to be subject to the Kingdom of Great Britain." And yet no measures were adopted when the French inhabitants repeatedly refused to take the oath of allegiance to the English Crown. In the years 1715, 1717, and again in 1719, 1720, and 1725, opportunities were afforded them to submit to the prescribed form, and between 1749 and 1755 five such opportunities were offered. They continually sided with our French opponents, and instigated the native races in the performance of every species of barbarous outrage against our English subjects. In the words of the French historian Rameau, "La majeure partie des Acadiens demeura donc Français par le fait, quoique Anglais par les traités." "The French inhabitants," wrote a contemporary observer, "who amount to many thousands, would, upon the first appearance of a French army, universally revolt." General Cornwallis, however, supported only in the half-hearted manner for which home Governments are notorious, contented himself by telling an assembly of French colonists what was obviously true, that "it would be contrary to common sense to suppose that one can remain in a province, and possess houses and lands there, without being subject to the sovereign of that province." Meanwhile the danger to English supremacy of French influence was a very real one, as appears from the despatches of Governor Lawrence. At last—not a minute too soon—action was determined upon. A final appeal, generous in its substance, was made, but was contemptuously rejected. In 1755 Colonel John Winslow received orders to effect the removal of the French inhabitants of the province to other colonies. He performed his duty with tenderness, avoiding any separation of families, disuniting few family groups, and permitting the people to take with them all their household effects which the ships could convey.

The reasons of French opposition then were the same as exist today among that concourse of foreigners who are our subjects by the Treaty of Paris, but to whom we submit as masters in the province of Quebec. There exists still that same hereditary attachment to France, the body of French Roman Catholics subservient chiefly to their French bishop, and kept by their priests distinct and separate from the English colonists. Fast in multiplying, ruled by their own laws, thrifty but wretchedly unprogressive, they have ruined the commercial prospects of Quebec, and seriously injured those of Montreal. The English Government is the only Government in the world which would admit of the existence in its own territory, to use Mr. Hart's expression, "of a nation within a nation." To this day, writes Mr. Hart, the French Canadians commemorate the victory of Carillon by carrying aloft the "Drapeau Blanc," conserved religiously in the National Sanctuary at Quebec. That is to say, they commemorate a victory achieved by French arms over the soldiers of the community to which they avowedly belong. The English traveller to Quebec will find near the Heights of Abraham a memorial statue to Montcalm far exceeding in grandeur the paltry monument erected on the spot where General Wolfe was slain in the service of England.

The victories of Wolfe and Amherst at Ticonderoga, Quebec, and Montreal form the most generally interesting part of this volume. At the great engagement which resulted in our capture of Quebec it appears that, according to the best estimate, the English soldiers numbered 4,828, the French side as many as 9,580 men, but then not half of this last body were regulars. This volume is profusely supplied with illustrations. There is a portrait of Montcalm which has not been engraved before, and a reproduction of a rare engraving of Montreal in 1760, when what is now the largest city in Canada consisted of a couple of churches and a score of ill-built houses.

PICTURES, especially portraits, even in the best regulated galleries, have long been suspected of indulging in grave or playful relaxation at nights by escaping the ignominy of hanging and bursting the frail bonds of frames and fixatives. Whether they confabulate or no on such occasions is a matter hitherto left somewhat doubtful. They may well do it, indeed, and in Pictures at Play they do it very well. The "Two Art Critics" who, with the aid of Mr. Harry Furniss, solve the problem are perhaps a little laggard with their revelations. They ought to have arrived with the catalogues and criticisms of May. As, however, some of the more instructive passages in the book are those that embody the criticism of the pictures themselves on the verdicts of art critics, the delay is not without excuse. Thus in one scene of very pretty satire numerous representatives of the "Portrait of a Lady," who all profess inordinate pride in being "on the line," are gathered around the "Mrs. Henry Marquand" of Mr. Sargent, while Mr. Richmond's "Lady X." and the "Comtesse Y." of M. Carolus-Duran are curious observers. These Academic ladies are terribly disconcerted by Mr. Sargent's portrait. "You can positively see all round her." She is so "lifelike" as to be "indecorous;" and as to "values"—what do they mean by values? —"Oh! bother 'values'! give me Worth," says one flat and fashionable lady, and another would not "give five shillings for her dress." Then there is "that Frenchman in the other room"—the "Monsieur Pasteur" of M. Carolus-Duran—"the man who wanted to vaccinate poor dear Miss Cobbe"; he is quite as unorthodox as Mr. Sargent's sitters. He is mightily pleased with "the Saturday Review man" who praised him for his "subtle changes of plane" and the facility with which anybody could "feel his whereabouts" all over his face. Finding the lions in the Academy "obviously stuffed," the cold, grey eye of M. Pasteur as he roams through the gallery is keenly intent on dogs and cats. His benevolence is baulked by a funny adventure. In Mr. Furniss's droll sketch he is left confronting, on his knees, Mr. Riviere's wooden bloodhound ("Requiescat," 413)—a good name, by the way, for that quintessence of Academic dogs. Naturally the occupants of modern and public galleries, like the Academy, the New, and the Grosvenor, are a good deal skittish in their play. An entertaining colloquy is the Jekyll and Hyde interview between Mr. Holl's "Mr. Gladstone" and Mr. Albert Toft's "Mr. Gladstone" (Bust, marble). Diverting also is the dialogue between the first Mr. Gladstone and Mr. Armitage's "Siren," who lives "Finsbury way" and offers her card to Mr. Gladstone just as Mr. Schmalz's "Christian Martyrs" distribute theirs in the way of business among the Academic ladies of the line. There is excellent fooling in Pictures at Play, though, it must be admitted, the satire is occasionally somewhat to seek. Something better than "Andromache in London" might have been looked for with so suggestive a theme. Here, as in "Mistaken Identities," and one or two other scenes, the satirical intent of the authors is so cunningly veiled as to be impenetrable. The obviously divergent views of the "Two Art Critics" are not without a piquant effect, as of a mock contention of good and evil principles, though a common accord of artistic faith and satirical aim might have strengthened the book without imperilling its lightness of touch and sportive humour.

THOSE WICKED BAZAARS.†

THE Vicar of Oxenhall uplifts his testimony against bazaars. Not against all bazaars, or at least not against bazaars as such, but against all bazaars and "fancy fairs" which are "held for religious or charitable purposes." His reasoning is plain. All religious and charitable persons ought to subscribe freely—Mr. Foster is good enough to specify, and to explain that they ought to subscribe not less than one-tenth part of their incomes—to religious and charitable objects, and that on the merits, without any spurious provocation from marionettes or bran-tubs.

Mr. Foster has made a stringent inquiry into the manners and customs of persons holding bazaars for charitable objects, and he has certainly collated some rather surprising information on the subject. At one "fancy fair" held at "B.," described as a seaside town with a large resident population—which suggests Brighton—for the benefit of the Church of Holy Trinity, there was a "café chantant" where ladies dispensed smiles at what—except in some cases—would certainly be extravagant prices. "A smile" cost half-a-crown, and "a wreath of smiles" half a sovereign. It would be interesting to know what a lady looks like when bestowing a wreath of smiles. Or is it effected by the simultaneous smiling of a wreath of ladies? Mr. Foster gives no particulars on this interesting topic. It is evident, however, that the smiles were the more precious because the programme announced that "undue hilarity was deprecated." At one very recent function a still more flagitious piece of coquetry has to be reported, though here happily the offending lady was of tender years. "A pretty little child sold a kiss for a sovereign." Mr. Foster has the temerity to mention the awful personage to whom she sold it. The House of Commons having very properly struck out the fifth clause of the Law of Libel Amendment Bill, we shall do nothing of the kind.

Warmly as Mr. Foster denounces the sale of smiles and kisses in the cause of religion and charity, he is still more indignant at the frequency and audacity with which the laws against lotteries are broken at bazaars. He quotes terrible speeches made by a profligate lord, a criminally disposed lady of title, and Dr. A. K. H. Boyd, expressing approval of lotteries, which are against the law, and even "fleecing" and "robbery" (at bazaars), which are contrary to the Ten Commandments. Worse even than this, it once happened that a mayor opened (with prayer) a bazaar at which lotteries were held (but it does not appear that they prayed that the prizes might be distributed to those who best deserved them), and that shortly afterwards he was constrained in his magisterial capacity to send a thimble-rigger to prison, whereupon the thimble-rigger pointed out that he was no worse than the mayor, except that his gambling operations had not been preceded by a similar devout observance. It is pleasant to discover that when the thimble-rigger was nabbed and laid in gaol, the mayor's heart, like Barbara Allen's, was "smit with sorrow," and that, having summoned a meeting of his townsfolk, he publicly abjured for the future the sinful practice of holding lotteries. The thimble-rigger does not seem to have been released from durance. Mr. Foster might have developed his studies on this subject a little further. He might have inquired why the Government, in obedience to the stern behests of Mr. Bradlaugh, institute prosecutions against Church bazaars in Lancashire where lotteries are announced to be held, and takes no notice of a gigantic lottery, advertised all over the kingdom, wherein all persons are invited to take a sixpenny chance of winning 150*l.*, or one of many other valuable prizes, for the benefit of a fund for the restoration of Monaghan Cathedral. The fact is that the subject is one of some practical difficulty. Persons interested in church-building and hospital-supporting find they can get money by bazaars, and not otherwise. Mr. Foster declares that they ought to get it by free gift, and that the meritorious end in view does not excuse its achievement by unlawful and unworthy means. It is notorious that such means of raising money are employed to a scandalous extent, and Mr. Foster denounces them in a straightforward and rather picturesque fashion.

MR. HENLEY'S BOOK OF VERSES.*

MR. HENLEY'S verses are deftly turned; but the proficient rhymesters of the day can be counted almost by the score, and what is more singular about this writer's work than its clever craftsmanship is its ring of genuine and virile humanity. The poems in the volume are for the most part dated, and can accordingly be recognized as written within the space of a few years, and those evidently years of youth. They contain, as the songs of youth are sure to contain, occasional echoes of older poets; and particularly of Heine and of Whitman, little as the strains of those two writers resemble each other. But in the main their character is vigorously personal. Mr. Henley has had the art to express, generally in spontaneous, taking, and effective forms of verse, both some among the harshest experiences life has to offer and some among its most common, wholesome, and abiding consolations. He puts the painful part of his matter first. The opening section of his volume is called "Hospital Rhymes and Rhythms," a title which sufficiently indicates the nature of its contents. Speaking generally, we are no partisans of the realistic method in literature or of its products; but this hospital division of Mr. Henley's work constitutes to our mind as curious and interesting a little chapter of realism as is to be found in English poetry since the days of Crabbe. By gift and instinct the strongest, as he was one of the earliest, of realists, Crabbe, as it seems to us, has missed his true rank and place in literature chiefly through the use of an inappropriate vehicle of expression. He adopted the standard metre of his day, the "heroic" couplet—a form strictly associated with urbane conventions of style and diction—in order to convey a view of human life and experience which was the reverse of conventional, and admitted neither blurring generality nor softening illusion. We are conscious accordingly of continual discords between the matter and the form of Crabbe's poetry. The realist of to-day is not exposed to any such influence of a prevailing tradition in his choice of a metrical form; and Mr. Henley in the exercise of his freedom has chosen to render his hospital impressions sometimes in unrhymed stanzas of varying structure, and sometimes in the shape of regular but very colloquial sonnets. Whether in recalling his own experiences before and after operation, or in tracing portraits of his fellow-sufferers or of the surgeons and nurse who ministered to them, he brings to his task in a remarkable measure that gift—the gift of abnormally acute and discriminating physical perception, with a command of the literary touch and vocabulary most directly suited to express it. Here is a characteristic example headed "Vigil":—

> Lived on one's back
> In the long hours of repose,
> Life is a practical nightmare—
> Hideous, asleep or awake.

Shoulders and loins
Ache . . . . . !
Ache, and the mattress
Runs into boulders and hummocks,
Glows like a kiln, while the bedclothes—
Tumbling, importunate, daft—
Ramble and roll, and the gas,
Screwed to its lowermost,
An inevitable atom of light,
Haunts, and a stertorous sleeper
Snores me to hate and despair.

Far in the stillness a cat
Languishes loudly. A cinder
Falls, and the shadows
Lurch to the leap of the flame. The next man to me
Turns with a moan; and the snorer,
The drug like a rope at his throat,
Gasps, gurgles, snorts himself free, as the night nurse,
Noiseless and strange,
Her bull's-eye half-lanterned in apron,
(Whispering me, "Are ye no sleepin' yet?")
Passes, list-slippered and peering,
Round, and is gone.

Sleep comes at last—
Sleep full of dreams and misgivings—
Broken with brutal and sordid
Voices and sounds
That impose on me, ere I can wake to it,
The unnatural, intolerable day.

More acceptable, doubtless, to those readers whose ear prefers rhythm with rhyme to rhythm without it; less grim in subject; and adding, moreover, the acuteness of moral to that of mere physical and nervous perception, are the portraits in sonnet-form, headed "Staff-Nurse, Old Style and New Style," "Lady-Probationer," "House-Surgeon," and "Visitor;" the latter being to our mind especially successful, and as direct and vivid a piece of portraiture, both as to aspect and character, as may easily be found in modern verse.

While this section of Mr. Henley's work is likely to awaken answering images and emotions chiefly in the minds of those readers who may have gone through the like sharp experience, and while it is remarkable chiefly for the unsparing, and yet unforced distressfulness of the impressions it conveys, the next section, headed "Life and Death," is mainly distinguished by the fresh directness and lyric buoyancy with which the poet harps anew on well-worn themes of consolation. He tells of the strength which the heart draws from its own courage, from love, beauty, spring weather, honest wine, and the sights and wonders of the sea. Even here the style and diction are sometimes deliberately and crudely realistic, as in the second verse of the following striking piece:—

Out of the night that covers me,
Black as the pit from pole to pole,
I thank whatever gods may be
For my unconquerable soul.

In the fell clutch of circumstance
I have not winced nor cried aloud,
Under the bludgeonings of chance
My head is bloody, but unbowed.

Beyond this place of wrath and tears
Looms but the Horror of the shade,
And yet the menace of the years
Finds, and shall find, me unafraid.

It matters not how strait the gate,
How charged with punishments the scroll,
I am the master of my fate,
I am the captain of my soul.

There is a manly vigour, and even dignity, about this which win us to accept the crudity. And in other pieces—constituting, indeed, much the chief part of the section—Mr. Henley shows that he can add grace and charm to force and directness of manner. The romantic fancy numbered XIV., the Spring song (No. XXVII.), the seaside stanzas dedicated "To my Mother" (No. I.), are all excellent in their way. Or, as an example of this pleasanter quality of Mr. Henley's work, let us take the impression set down in the following two stanzas:—

She sauntered by the swinging seas,
A jewel glittered in her ear,
And, teasing her along, the breeze
Brought many a rounded grace more near.

So passing, one with wave and beam,
She left, for memory to caress,
A laughing thought, a golden gleam,
A hint of hidden loveliness.

Verse of this thoroughly frank and right quality on common themes is not so easy as it seems, nor by any means so plentiful as we could wish it. There is enough of it in Mr. Henley's volume to deserve, and we should hope to earn, a popularity for his book among that large class of readers who, liking poetry, yet like it plain, and whom far-fetched motives, ingenious metres, and recondite constructions fail to attract.

Not but what Mr. Henley can handle the ingenuities of verse when he likes, and play at tricks of craftsmanship with the most adroit. A third division of his book is headed "Bric-à-Brac," and consists of exercises in metrical form—ballade, rondel, sonnet or quatorzain, and rondeau—of the kind which has given so much employment to English verse-wrights of late years. Even in these exercises, while he misses something of the whimsical daintiness and light charm of which such forms are capable in hands like those of Mr. Austin Dobson or Mr. Andrew Lang—yet even here Mr. Henley's gift of lusty vigour, his spirited ring, his touch of wholesome plainness and freshness, do not desert him. Few English ballades, for instance, strike us as more agreeable reading than Mr. Henley's two "Of Spring Music" and "Made in Hot Weather"; and this concluding section of his work is welcome as completing the variety of contents in what is certainly one of the most interesting, fresh, and spirited among recent volumes of verse.

PHYSICAL EDUCATION.*

POPULAR feeling in favour of physical education in schools is considerably in advance of the skill and intelligence of the majority of its teachers, and of the manuals they put forth. The public, indeed, is getting impatient of the small results which accrue from the various "systems" of elementary gymnastics, and attention is being directed to manual training as promising greater economic and sanitary advantages than mere physical training. This, however, is an error which it is desirable to correct as soon as possible, as manual training cannot be made sufficiently systematic for the proper development of the whole body, and at best only a small number of school children can be submitted to it, whereas physical training is required for children of all ages and conditions of life.

We are very much behind other countries in the adoption of physical training as part of our national system of education; but there are many reasons for this backwardness. We are justly proud of our athletics, and in this respect we are far in advance of the rest of the world; but unfortunately athletics do not supply all our needs. Athletics have the two great disadvantages of requiring larger open spaces than can be found in our towns, where physical training is most needed, and success in them depends on a system of rivalry and individual competition, which limits their use to a comparatively small number of persons. The physical education we stand most in need of is such as can be practised by large numbers of children in limited areas like schoolrooms and playgrounds, and which meet the wants of all sorts of children—the weakly inhabitants of our large towns as well as the stronger ones living under more favourable sanitary conditions. These requirements can be best met by some of the simpler exercises with light apparatus which can be carried on in large classes, such as dumb-bells and French bars or bâtons, and not so well by the evolutions of military drill, and the complicated posings of the body and limbs with empty hands. With respect to military drill we have prejudices to contend with which have been overcome elsewhere. A few years ago, when the need for physical education began to be recognized, military drill was introduced into many schools, and the work of teaching it fell into the hands of the common soldier, whose only qualification was a technical acquaintance with the details of his art, but who was ignorant of the laws of physical development, and the amount of endurance different children could bear, and the result was therefore rarely beneficial and often injurious. The adoption of military drill has moreover retarded the development of a rational—and we may also say a national—system of physical education in this country by throwing the work into the hands of the drill sergeants, and thus deterring persons of education from taking it up as a career; while in America and on the Continent, where it has made most progress, it is in the hands of medical men of good standing in their profession. The names of Dr. Hitchcock, of Amhurst, and Dr. Sergent, of Harvard, the directors of their respective college gymnasia, are among the best known American medical men; but in this country even the gymnasia at our military colleges are under the direction of military and not medical officers. A worse evil than this has befallen us in the adoption of military drill in schools—and we commend this to the notice of School Boards—inasmuch as it has been found to be almost worthless for the purpose of physical training; and, consequently, it has discredited as well as retarded the adoption of better methods. This important fact was pointed out many years ago by the late Mr. Maclaren of the Oxford Gymnasium, who found, while training some drill-sergeants as military gymnasium-instructors, that in four months these already well-drilled men became so muscular about the arms, shoulders, and chest that they could not get into their uniform without assistance, and, when they got their tunics on, they could not make them meet within a hand's breadth. After many years this fact of the comparative worthlessness of mere military drill is being acknowledged by military men themselves; for we now learn that a new system of drill, combined with physical training of a gymnastic kind, is to be introduced into the army, and that it was exhibited to the Commander-in-Chief at Aldershot recently by Major-General P. Smith, who maintains, we read in the newspaper report, "that the physical training of a soldier is entirely neglected in the routine of regimental drill, and he, with others of high military standing, realize the want of a minor drill which combines with it physical training." When the soldiers arrive at this conclusion educationalists may safely remove military drill—except just so much of it as is necessary to marshal children in classes for other exercises—from their programme, and shake off with it the incubus under which physical education has so long laboured in this country.

It is not in the higher branches of gymnastics that our English system of training is at fault. These have much in common with athletics and are limited in their employment by the requirements of space, apparatus, and skilled supervision. It is in the elementary part that our system is deficient. Nor is there, indeed, any lack of "systems" and enthusiastic advocates of their real or imaginary advantages. It is in the multitude of systems that our difficulty in a great measure lies. There are Swedish, German, French, and American systems, differing so much that one might suppose that the human body was not anatomically the same in these various branches of the European race, or that human faculty and men's occupations were different in each of them. The Swedish system of which we hear so much is based on a study of the individual action of the muscles which would puzzle the professor of anatomy to unravel, and which in practice is useless, as it is well known to physiologists that the muscles perform their functions in certain well-defined groups, and very rarely as individual structures. It is the physiologist, and not the anatomist, who should superintend the physical education of the body, for its object is to secure the performance, in the highest state of perfection, of all the functions of the body, and not merely to develop the muscular system. This view of the objects of physical education renders the selection of a series of elementary exercises comparatively easy, because the functions of the body are few in number, while the number of individual muscles is very great.

It is the fashion just now to praise everything German, and especially German gymnastics; but it is to the French that we must go for the lighter and more graceful forms and exercises suitable for children, such as calisthenics, dumb-bells, bar-bells, fencing, and dancing; and a glance at the pages of the two French manuals on our list will show how largely our English system of elementary training, as represented by the three excellent little manuals of Mr. Alexander, is derived from the French. What is most remarkable on comparing these two sets of manuals is that the French are official codes of the physical exercises to be used in the primary, secondary, and higher schools and colleges, with the decrees regulating them and instructions for teachers, while the English are issued by, at the risk of and on the sole authority of, a private teacher. Mr. Alexander's manuals may be deemed the A B C of physical education, and may be accepted as the newest and best guides we possess. The author has kept in mind the importance of economizing the time and capacity of both the pupils and the teachers by arranging the exercises on a systematic plan and in a progressive order, so that what is taught in the infant school as calisthenics (without apparatus) is available for the dumb-bell and other exercises, with apparatus, in the upper schools. Our knowledge and experience of these exercises is sufficiently advanced to be embodied in a code, and such a code would be most useful throughout the country, as a means of securing common action and a uniform scheme of physical education. Whatever may be the difference of opinion as to the best methods of promoting mental development, there cannot be many on the narrow ground of elementary physical education. The exercises already in use are more than sufficient, and two or three teachers and physiologists could easily make a selection from them which would answer every requirement for children under thirteen or fourteen years of age; while the higher branches might remain optional as to forms to be adopted above those ages. Great discretion is required in the teacher in advancing a student from the elementary to the higher forms of gymnastics. The pupil who handles dumb-bells, bars, and clubs deals only with a few pounds of weight; but in climbing, swinging, vaulting, &c., he is dealing with the whole weight of the body—nine, ten, or eleven stone. The difference is very great, and should be made by slow and well-graded steps. Another popular error should also be guarded against. It is now everywhere said that gymnastics should be recreative, and not laborious; but this is only partially true. Gymnastic exercises of all kinds are amusing and recreative in the best sense of the word, but to be useful they must be made a task and progressive in their character. To play at gymnastics is to waste the strength; to practise them wisely is to increase the strength, health, and grace of the body, and improve all the natural functions. Illustrations in books of this kind are of great value to both the teacher and pupil, and both the French and English manuals are profuse in quantity, but a little deficient in quality—this remark especially applies to the manuals for girls.

OCCULTISM and theosophy now enjoy no inconsiderable vogue, and have a very respectable literature of their own, rejoicing, for example, in a "theosophical monthly" entitled Lucifer, "designed to bring light to the hidden things of darkness," under the editorship of H. P. Blavatsky and Mabel Collins.

Of the two volumes before us, Light on the Path and Magic, the first is a brochure avowedly "written for the personal use of those who are ignorant of the Eastern wisdom, and who desire to enter within its influence." Mr. Laurence Oliphant, in his new book, Scientific Religion, quotes the last three rules in Light on the Path, and terms them the climax of a particular philosophy. Into Mr. Oliphant's question as to whether the philosophy itself is of any use to humanity we do not propose to enter. So far as we can gather from the mystic language in which it is couched Light on the Path is intended to guide the footsteps of those who have discarded the forms of religion while retaining the moral principle to its fullest extent. It is in harmony with much that was said by Socrates and Plato, although the author does not use the phraseology of those philosophers, but rather the language of Buddhism, easily understood by esoteric Buddhists, but difficult to grasp by those without the pale. Light on the Path may, we think, be said to be the only attempt in this language and in this century to put practical occultism into words; and it may be added, by way of further explanation, that the character of Gautama Buddha, as shown in Sir Edwin Arnold's Light of Asia, is the perfect type of the being who has reached the threshold of Divinity by this road. That it has reached a third edition speaks favourably for this multum in parvo of the science of occultism; and "M. C." may be expected to gather fresh laurels in future.

Dr. Hartmann's Magic, as compared with Light on the Path, is a bulky tome; and in its closely-printed pages students of occultism will find hints, "practical" and otherwise, likely to be of great service to them in the pursuit of their studies and researches. It was not the author's "object, in composing this book, to write merely a code of Ethics, and thereby to increase the already existing enormous mountain of unread moral precepts, but to assist the student of occultism in studying the elements of which his own soul is composed, and to learn to know his own physical organism. I want to give an impulse to the study of a science which may be called the 'anatomy and physiology of the Soul,' which investigates the elements of which the soul is composed, and the source from which man's desires and emotions spring." Dr. Hartmann's compendium is "an attempt to show the way how man may become a co-operator of the Divine Power, whose product is Nature," and his pages, as described by himself, "constitute a book which may properly have the title of Magic, for if the readers succeed in practically following its teaching, they will be able to perform the greatest of all magical feats, the spiritual regeneration of Man." Dr. Hartmann's book has also gone into a third edition, and has developed from an insignificant pamphlet, "written originally for the purpose of demonstrating to a few inexperienced inquirers that the study of the occult side of nature was not identical with the vile practices of sorcery," into a compendious volume, comprising, we are willing to believe, the entire philosophic system of occultism. There are abundant evidences that the science of theosophy has made vast strides in public estimation of late years, and that those desirous of experimenting in this particular, and in many respects fascinating, branch of ethics, have leaders whose teaching they can follow with satisfaction to themselves.

ÉTUDES SUR L'ESPAGNE.†

THE name of M. A. Morel-Fatio is by this time well known to students of Spanish literature, and even to others. In England he has secured access to a large class of readers as the author of the article on Spanish literature in the new edition of the Encyclopædia Britannica. Readers who use French know him as the author, editor, compiler (he appears in all three characters) of a capital volume on L'Espagne au XVIe et au XVIIe siècle, as editor of the Mágico Prodigioso, and as the translator of Lazarillo de Tórmes. M. Morel-Fatio has always shown in his work a combination of qualities which is rarer than we could wish. He has the antiquarian and the commentator's passion for getting at the facts, and with it a faculty for estimating the purely literary merits of books old and new, not always found joined to the industry of the pure scholar. This volume of "Etudes" is described as a première série, and is to be the first of a line of others intended to "raviver autant que possible le goût des choses de l'Espagne en les expliquant de notre mieux." M. Morel-Fatio speaks further on of "un gros livre, qui paraîtra en son temps, sur la société espagnole au XVIe et au XVIIe siècle." Whether we are to take this as a promise on his part to produce the gros livre, or only as the expression of a hope that some day some other will do it, is not quite clear. We hope it is a promise, and when the big book appears can promise M. Morel-Fatio some favourable and attentive hearers.

The first of the three papers which make up this volume is headed "Comment la France a connu et compris l'Espagne depuis le moyen âge jusqu'à nos jours." It is a well-written and luminous survey of a very considerable bulk of writing, beginning with the road-books of the French pilgrims who crowded to the shrine of St. James at Compostella, and ending with the ever-welcome names of Hugo, Mérimée, and Gautier. Between these two lie diplomatists, mediæval scholars, the Spanish refugees who swarmed in Paris towards the close of Philip II.'s reign, followers and imitators of that master scamp Antonio Perez—the espagnolisants of the seventeenth century—the philosophers and travellers of the eighteenth. Great names are there, and obscure ones beside them. The refugee Luna, who continued (as he called it) the Lazarillo, and the Spanish Admirable Crichton, Fernan de Córdova, have their turn with Corneille, St.-Simon, Le Sage, Voltaire, and Beaumarchais. It will be seen that M. Morel-Fatio has surveyed no small part of French literature and Spanish life. But, though the essay is crowded, it is thoroughly clear. Successive men and things are described, judged, and placed with the neatness and lucidity which are so French and so lovable. The literary faculty of M. Morel-Fatio is excellently employed in drawing the line between what was French and what was really Spanish in the much that France has written about Spain; and this is conspicuously the case in his mention of Le Sage. Excellent, too, is his treatment of the three great names, Hugo, Gautier, and Prosper Mérimée. We at least do not approve him the less because his warmest praise is given to the author of Carmen. "Jamais," he declares, "en aucune langue, on n'avait encore décrit deux âmes espagnoles avec plus de force concentrée et une simplicité plus vivante." Hugo's Spain is terrible, Gautier is artistically splendid, but Mérimée's is the real Spain, just sufficiently selected and arranged. The second paper of "Recherches sur Lazarille de Tórmes," which is not a reprint of the preface to the translation, is bibliographical, critical, and historical. M. Morel-Fatio decides, with many reasons of painful cogency to support him, that this little gem was not the work of Diego Hurtado de Mendoza. As it hurts us to be convinced of this against our will, we are happy to see that some of M. Morel-Fatio's arguments seem wanting in force. We demur to his contention that a gentleman of the great house of Mendoza would never have condescended to study the life of beggars and manifold other rogues. Surely there have been Prince Hals in this world who found pleasure in watching the unyoked humour of the idleness of Nyms and Bardolphs.

The last paper, headed "L'histoire dans Ruy-Blas," may perhaps annoy some of the weaker sort of Hugolâtres, but they can only be the very weakest. M. Morel-Fatio knows as well as any man, and says emphatically, that we love Victor because he was a great poet; we do not go to him for facts, and that if his blunders came in every second line, they would none the less be magnificently well said. But Victor challenged the world to pick holes in Ruy-Blas. Did he not say, "Du reste, et cela va sans dire, il n'y a pas dans Ruy-Blas un détail de vie privée ou publique, d'intérieur, d'ameublement, de blason, d'étiquette, de biographie, de chiffre ou de topographie qui ne soit scrupuleusement exact"? Well, M. Morel-Fatio has tested this magnificent boast, and shows—what will surprise few—that Victor laid hands on the Mémoires of Mme. d'Aulnoy and the Etat présent de l'Espagne of the Abbé de Veyrac, and got up his history out of them. Further, that, in the process of getting up, he took great liberties with the facts, and made various blunders of his own. He transferred the stories told of Marie-Louise d'Orleans, the first wife of Charles II., to Maria de Neuberg, his second wife. He attributed the tyranny of the Duchess of Terranova, the Camarera Mayor, to the Duchess of Albuquerque, a lady of admirable character. He sent his hero to fetch flowers from Caramanchel, a distance of two hundred miles or so, before breakfast, instead of to Carabanchel, which is just outside of Madrid; he serenely took the word Montaygo, the name of a tax, for a proper name, he nobly repeated an absurd misprint of the title Teba, and made it immortal in his verse, he invented "Don Guritan," in defiance of Castilian, to the open-mouthed joy of the Spanish paper. To be sure, what does all this matter? but then why did Victor publish that ill-advised piece of swagger about his local colour? There is where M. Morel-Fatio waited for him. On the other hand, the critic defends the poet against other charges, and shows that he had chapter and verse for much. The story of "Mes oiseaux d'Allemagne, ils sont tous morts," is worth retailing. The Camarera Major to Marie-Louise d'Orleans (a daughter of our own Henriette d'Angleterre) wrung the necks of the poor Queen's parrots because they only spoke French. When the Queen heard of it she said nought, but she thought the more. When the Duchess came in at the usual time, and was proceeding to make a solemn curtsey, spreading out her petticoats and gracefully bowing down her wicked old head, the temptation was too strong for the blood of Henri IV., the Stuarts, and the Tudors—"La Reine sans lui dire une seule parole, lui donna deux soufflets à tour de bras," says Mme. d'Aulnoy. Off went the Duchess, a Pignatelli, in a foaming rage. She gathered together four hundred noble dames of her kith and kin, and gravely they marched to the King to demand reparation for this intolerable insult. But the Queen said it was an antojo, the irresistible longing of a pregnant woman, which is an excuse for anything in Spain, and the flattered monarch refused to interfere. So the Queen boxed her tyrant's ears, and did not apologize. Like Mary of Scotland, Marie-Louise had at least in her life one hour of triumph and of vengeance.

NEW BOOKS AND REPRINTS.

THE special aim of Mr. John Wrightson's elementary treatise, The Principles of Agricultural Practice (Chapman & Hall), is perhaps more fully expressed by the title "Principles of English Agriculture," which continuously heads its pages. The book treats of agriculture in England as "an instructional subject." It is, in the most practical sense of the word, educational, being made up of lectures addressed by a Professor of Agriculture to teachers. As examiner in agriculture to the Science and Art Department, Mr. Wrightson has abundant opportunities of estimating the various educational methods pursued at schools and colleges. "I have been struck," he says, "with the degree of narrowness, not only in the answers given to questions, but also in the selection of questions to be answered." He objects to the apparent identification of the phrase "theory of agriculture" with "chemistry" in the syllabus of agricultural education of the Royal Agricultural Society. Chemistry, he argues, is not agriculture, any more than agriculture is chemistry. Botany, geology, physiology, and other branches of science must be added to chemistry, as necessary to the professional equipment of agricultural colleges, but these subjects should be strictly confined to their respective exponents. The professor of agriculture ought not to attempt to combine the teaching of these branches of science with the theory and practice of agriculture. He must be content to indicate the points of contact or of relationship and respect the limitations of his subject. This, in brief, is Mr. Wrightson's ideal method. But, while he pleads for limitations in scientific exposition, he would greatly enlarge the teacher's aims in a practical direction. Thus, at p. 129, he cites the clearing of land as an illustration. "I scarcely ever find," he remarks, "a candidate select a question asking the way in which he would clean a foul piece of wheat-stubble. They prefer to enlarge upon the dominant constituents and the double silicates. They do not like farming; they like chemistry." Elsewhere, in treating of crops, rotations, drainage, fertilizers, and so forth, Mr. Wrightson enforces the excellent lesson that the agricultural professor must be a professor of farming as well as an adept at science.

In A Season in Sutherland (Macmillan & Co.) Mr. John E. Edwards-Moss has produced a delightful little volume for the lounger in summer shade or the tourist who likes a little sport and natural history when rambling. Who loves these, and loves a garden too, will thank Mr. Edwards-Moss for as pleasant a book as could be desired. Many a Southron, unhappily ignorant of the beauty of the land of lochs and its agreeable climate, will read with some incredulity of the Sutherland garden within sound of the northern sea which inspires the author's enthusiasm. With its roses, fuchsias, honeysuckle, carnations, and hosts of old-fashioned flowers, it suggests Hesperian richness and remoteness. Mr. Edwards-Moss hints of a far-wandered current of the Gulf-stream, though doubtless the sympathy and culture of which his description also tells have had much to do with the affluence of his bowery garden. We must leave to anglers his stirring experiences of fishing in loch and stream, his capture of a sixteen-pound fresh-river salmon after a gallant contest, his admirable chapter on loch trout, and his speculations on the proposed introduction into lochs of the fresh-water shrimp.

Señora Villena and Gray: an Oldhaven Romance (Sampson Low & Co.) form "two volumes in one," to quote the title, and are written by the author of Real People, the amusing opening sketch of which, dealing with Spanish-American society, we noticed the other day. Señora Villena introduces anew the same warm-hearted, impressionable, and charmingly naïf persons who figure in Mr. Marion Wilcox's shorter paper. It is far more elaborate, however, and quite as graceful and felicitous in style and characterization. The "Oldhaven Romance" is more notable for boldness of conception than for success in narration. The scheme of the story is striking, but the story itself is finely imagined rather than well told. While Poe and Hawthorne are at times suggested, it is even more akin to the well-known story of Tieck of the hidden treasure which changes the heart of its possessor, a poor peasant, into a heart of stone.

The fourth volume of Dean Church's "Miscellaneous Writings"—Spenser (Macmillan & Co.)—is practically a new edition of the author's contribution under this title to the "English Men of Letters" series. A note on the name and family of Spenser's wife is added to the present reprint, derived from Dr. Grosart's annotated edition of the Lismore Papers.

A Plain Commentary on the Minor Prophets (Masters & Co.) is a concise and handy volume, likely to be found serviceable by students and teachers. It is put forth as a compilation "from various sources"—which might have been indicated, by the way—and is the work of the author of Christ in the Law.

A readable addition to the series of "Missionary Manuals" is the Rev. Dr. McFarlane's Among the Cannibals of New Guinea (London Missionary Society). The book is a history of the Society's Papuan missions, and is illustrated by drawings that appear to have merited a more artistic process of reproduction than they receive.

A Handbook of Foreign Missions is a much-needed compendium of historical and statistical information issued by the Religious Tract Society. Among its useful features are summaries of work, expenditure, and income, appended to the historical sketches of the various Societies. American and Roman Catholic missions are included in the survey.

Mr. Albert Vandam's translation of Conrad Busken Huet's Land of Rubens: a Companion for Visitors to Belgium (Sampson Low & Co) can hardly be said to represent the literary style of "the Ste.-Beuve of Holland." In the first place, the translator has been pleased to "omit many things" which he thought would have proved "so many puzzles" to all but well-informed Dutchmen. This is the very wrong way of translation. Then the book shows signs of wanting revision. And the author cannot have perpetrated anything equivalent to such English as this:—"Though not in the same sense of Memling and the Van Eycks, Rubens was nevertheless a thorough Catholic." Nor is it quite up to the Ste.-Beuve standard to describe Rubens as "a much stauncher Catholic than Jordaens, who split with his ancestors' faith."

Messrs. F. J. Rowe and W. T. Webb's Selections from Tennyson (Macmillan & Co.) is one of the "English Classics for Indian Students," and an excellent selection for the purpose, though the annotation is considerably in excess of what is required by intelligent schoolboys.

A third edition of Sir Stephen De Vere's Translations from Horace—recently noticed in this column—is the latest accession to the "Canterbury Poets" series (Walter Scott). The interesting preface on poetical translation and the notes are included.

Among new editions we have Dr. William Knighton's Struggles for Life (Williams & Norgate); Plays of Lessing, edited and translated by E. Bell, M.A., "Bohn's Select Library" (G. Bell & Son); The Princess Casamassima, by Henry James (Macmillan & Co.); Zanoni, "Pocket Volume" edition (Routledge); Queen Mab, by Julia Kavanagh (Spencer Blackett); and Clemency Franklyn, A York and a Lancaster Rose, and Oldbury, by Annie Keary (Macmillan & Co.)

We have also received the Fine Arts Catalogue of the Glasgow Exhibition (T. & A. Constable); The Insufficiency of Revivalism as a Religious System, by Robert Mackintosh (Glasgow: Maclehose); An Examination of the Theory of Evolution, by George Gresswell (Williams & Norgate); British National Consolidation, by "A British Colonist" (Trübner & Co.); Tin, a Novel, by Edward Bosankett (Fisher Unwin); Fifty Reasons for being a Homœopath, by J. Compton Burnett, M.D. (Homœopathic Publishing Co.); Stock Exchange Securities in 1877 and 1888 Compared, by John Robert Carter, F.S.S. (Mathiesons); and The Muster Roll of Windlesham House, Brighton, 1837-87, compiled by Mr. Henry C. Malden.

In our notice of the Architectural Room at the Royal Academy last week, we inadvertently assumed that Mr. Basil Champneys is the architect of the buildings at Knightsbridge recently the subject of a controversy in the House of Commons.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

SUN LIFE OFFICE.

ESTABLISHED 1810.

EXTRAORDINARY RESULTS.

THE profits paid this year in cash by the SUN LIFE OFFICE have been exceptionally large, surpassing those hitherto given, and for which the Society has been so justly noted, and average 196 per cent. of the annual premium (nearly two premiums) now payable in cash; or 332 per cent. of the annual premium (more than 3¼ premiums) added to the sum assured, exemplified more fully, at the average age 35, by the following table :

Years in force	Annual	Cash £	s.	d.	Addition £	s.	d.
5	Premium,	28	2	1	59	11	11
10		51	9	9	101	3	8
15	aged 35,	52	13	3	95	0	2
20		52	15	9	86	12	3
25	£1,000,	61	1	6	91	16	0
30		79	15	5	112	3	5
35	£28 6 8	82	15	1	108	8	0
		£408	12	10	£654	15	5

Thus a Policy of £1,000 becomes one of over £1,654, or cash has been returned which, improved at 4 per cent., would equal £709, or the premium is totally extinguished.

Full examples at various ages will be supplied on application, but the above may be considered as representative.

IMPORTANT NOTICE.

Policies effected NOW or before MIDSUMMER DAY will be entitled at the next DIVISION of PROFITS to rank for five full years' Bonus, and so obtain one year's additional Share of Profits.

Obtain and read the Prospectus of the Society.

14,061. An East-End Committee would be grateful for a pension of 3s. for an OLD COUPLE of excellent character and provident habits who have lived for twenty-nine years in their present house. The husband, aged seventy-two, is now quite unable to work; wife's age, seventy-eight. Clergyman and private friends supplement the pension asked. Home very clean and tidy. £3 18s. required.

13,456. The Poplar Committee need help for a very respectable WOMAN whose husband has softening of the brain and can do no work. She is in service and giving satisfaction. She pays half the cost of boarding out her three children; a local friend helps with 3s. per week, and further assistance to the extent of £5 14s. is needed. The woman has been in receipt of this allowance for eighteen months. Children are doing well.

13,745. The Shoreditch Committee appeal for £10 8s. for an OLD COUPLE, whom they have succeeded in getting into a HOME. They are without friends, and both quite past work. In his younger days the man saved £[illegible] out of very small earnings. He has belonged to a sick club all his life.

13,185. The Stepney Committee ask for £5 4s. to supplement a pension to a WIDOW aged seventy-one, whose husband, a bookbinder, was thirty-five years with one firm and twenty-seven years a member of a Benefit Society. She is quite unable to do any work.

MEMORIALS OF THE HON. ION KEITH-FALCONER,

Late Lord Almoner's Professor of Arabic in the University of Cambridge, and Missionary to the Mohammedans of Southern Arabia.

By the Rev. ROBERT SINKER, B.D.

Librarian of Trinity College, Cambridge.

Large crown 8vo. with Portrait, Map, and Illustration, 7s. 6d.

"The story of Keith-Falconer's brief work in Arabia and his last sickness is full of deep human interest. The whole memoir is written with excellent taste, judgment, and feeling."—Scotsman.

"Falconer was a pupil at Harrow, at Cambridge, and at Leipzig. In the three places his strong individuality, his tender affectionateness, his clear and absolute convictions as to all that is essential and lustrous in the Christian economy, were soon and honoured."—Spectator.

"Profoundly interesting."—Banner.

"This is a remarkable and delightful book."—Record.

LETTERS FROM DOROTHY OSBORNE TO SIR WILLIAM TEMPLE.

By EDWARD A. PARRY, Barrister-at-Law.

"Her letters show no little of the French esprit which makes the charm of those of Madame de Sévigné."—Times.

"Her epistolary style is remarkably spirited and gives her letters a superior place in English literature to that occupied by the memoirs of her contemporaries, Lady Hutchinson and Lady Fanshawe. If, as Macaulay added, the mutual relations of the two sexes are at least as important as the mutual relations of any two Governments in the world, Dorothy Osborne's letters might take rank with the Treaty of Nymwegen."—Athenæum.

"Mr. Parry has done his work lovingly, for he has hunted up every particular that throws light on Dorothy's family, friends, and home, and her letters in this sympathetic setting form quite a romance of real life."—Vanity Fair.

"The book is handsomely got up in the correct antique style; the portraits of Mistress Osborne and Sir William Temple are beautifully executed; and the prefatory notes are full of apparently correct information."—St. James's Gazette.

"The editor of this fascinating volume has done his part with judgment and with full appreciation of his heroine's excellences. The information he supplies is always to the point, and the reader who is not intimately acquainted with the period will find many an allusion explained and many a difficulty removed, for which he cannot fail to be grateful. The book, moreover, is well got up, and wins the reader by its appearance before he has tasted its quality."—Spectator.

PARKER GILLMORE (UBIQUE), Author of "The Great Thirst Land," "Gun, Rod, and Saddle," &c.

"Full of incidents......'Days and Nights by the Desert' is capital reading."—Scotsman.

"A narrative of hunting and shooting exploits such as Nimrod, were he still alive, might envy." Manchester Guardian.

BY LUCAS MALET.

A COUNSEL of PERFECTION. By LUCAS

MALET, Author of "Colonel Enderby's Wife," "Little Peter," &c. 1 vol. with Frontispiece, 6s.

"In finish and delicacy of workmanship, it contains, we think, the most perfect art which Lucas Malet has produced......Fine form, fine grouping, fine colouring, humorous delineation and precision of design." Spectator.

"A genuine piece of artistic work and a delightful story......The book is a work of an extremely clever and extremely refined writer; cameo-like in its delicacy and reticence, and yet conceived on a large scale of feeling, and superficial neither in workmanship nor thought." Universal Review.

BY MRS. SEVERNE.

THE PILLAR HOUSE: a Novel. By

FLORENCE SEVERNE. 1 vol. with Frontispiece, 6s.

"Told in simple and forcible English."—Scotsman.

"In literary merit this story is far beyond the average. The plot is clever, skilfully worked out, and the interest never flags for a moment."—Newcastle Chronicle.

BY "THE PRIG."

A ROMANCE of the RECUSANTS. By the Author of "The Life of a Prig," "Dulce Domum," &c. 1 vol. 5s.

"The clever and amusing author of 'The Churgress' and other similar productions throws away in his present tale the lively mask under which he has told so many well-aimed truths. . . . It is hardly necessary to say that the story is well written, and that these harrowing scenes, but too common during the period here described, are related with both power and feeling."—Morning Post.

"The story is full of incident and adventure.......It is a well-conceived romance, and likely to be widely read." Scotsman.

MACMILLAN & CO.'S NEW BOOKS.

NEW NOVELS AT ALL LIBRARIES.

Fraternity: a Romance. 2 vols. Crown 8vo. 21s.

"'Fraternity,'" says the Scotsman, "for its liberality of thought, the nobility of its aspirations, and here and there for its grasp of character, may be placed in a class of fiction of which nowadays we have too few examples—that of the earlier productions of George Eliot......It is written in a charming style, and gives great promise of its author's future."

The St. James's Gazette says:—"The best parts of 'Fraternity' are the descriptions of life in a fast-decaying class—the small landowners in North Wales. .....We can recommend this interesting story."

BY F. MARION CRAWFORD.

With the Immortals. By F. MARION CRAWFORD, Author of "Mr. Isaacs," "Dr. Claudius," "Paul Patoff," &c. 2 vols. Extra Crown 8vo. [Ready July 3.

BY HENRY JAMES.

The Reverberator. By HENRY JAMES, Author of "The American," "The Europeans," "Daisy Miller," "The Princess Casamassima," &c. 2 vols. Globe 8vo. 12s.

The Globe says:—"Mr. James is here at his best. His canvas is not too large, and he fills it to perfection. Every character in the book stands out in clearly defined proportions, so admirably minute and complete is the technical workmanship......It is impossible not to enjoy the process by which the characters in the story are portrayed for us."

The Daily Telegraph says:—"Admirers of Mr. Henry James will find something to please them in 'The Reverberator.' The novelist in this instance is frankly and openly playful."

BY THOMAS HARDY.

Wessex Tales: Strange, Lively, and Commonplace. By THOMAS HARDY, Author of "The Woodlanders," "Far from the Madding Crowd," &c. 2 vols. Globe 8vo. 12s.

"These idylls of West Country life," says the Times, "will rank among the truest things that the novelist of the yeomen, the shepherds, and the woodlanders has given us."

The Morning Post says:—"Every one of these tales comes up to the standard which is naturally expected from their author."

OLIVER CROMWELL. By FREDERIC HARRISON. Crown 8vo. 2s. 6d. ["TWELVE ENGLISH STATESMEN" SERIES.

The Spectator says: "Well and truly has Mr. Frederic Harrison told the story of Oliver Cromwell's life and work; and what a story it is......We will take leave of Mr. Harrison's book by quoting his brilliant summary of the foreign policy of the Protector."

The Scotsman says:—"The difficulties of the task have been grappled with in a masterly manner, and with brilliant success—......It is eloquent but never diffuse. It is clear and forcible."

 The following Volumes in the Series are also ready, Crown 8vo. 2s. 6d. each, namely:

Cardinal Wolsey. By Professor M. CREIGHTON, M.A., D.C.L., LL.D.

William the Third. By H. D. TRAILL.

Henry the Second. By ALICE STOPFORD GREEN, is just ready. The seven other Volumes of the Series, as announced, will follow at short intervals.

A SEASON in SUTHERLAND. By JOHN E. EDWARDS-MOSS. Crown 8vo. 4s. 6d.

"To all in whom the sporting instinct is keen, this book will be welcome; but it will also delight those who, though they handle not gun or rod, and have no ear for the 'music of the reel' are yet not blind to the beauty and the mystery of hill and stream and sea."—Elgin Courant.

THE WORKS of ARTHUR HUGH CLOUGH. 2 vols. Crown. 7s. 6d. each. I. POEMS. New and Revised Edition. II. PROSE REMAINS, with a Selection from his Letters and a Memoir. Edited by HIS WIFE.

COMPLETION OF THE FIRST VOLUME, A–B.

Just published, royal 4to. half-morocco, £2 12s. 6d. Vol. I., A–B (may also be had handsomely bound in whole russia). Part IV. BRA–CASS, 4to. paper covers, 12s. 6d.; or separately, Section I., BRA–BYZ, 7s. 6d.; Section II., C–CASS, 5s.

A NEW ENGLISH DICTIONARY ON HISTORICAL PRINCIPLES,

B.A. Lond., Hon. M.A. Oxon., LL.D. Edin., D.C.L. Dunelm., &c.; sometime President of the Philological Society,

With the assistance of many Scholars and Men of Science.

THE OXFORD ENGLISH DICTIONARY aims at furnishing an adequate account of the meaning, origin, and history of English words now in general use, or known to have been in use at any time during the last 700 years. It endeavours:—

(1) To show with regard to each individual word when, how, in what shape, and with what signification it became English; what development of form and meaning it has since received; which of its uses have become obsolete and which survive; what new uses have since arisen, by what processes, and when:

(2) To illustrate these facts by a series of quotations ranging from the first known occurrence of the word to the latest, or down to the present day; the word being thus made to exhibit its own history and meaning; and

(3) To treat the etymology of each word strictly on the basis of historical fact and in accordance with the methods and results of modern philological science.

THE OXFORD ENGLISH DICTIONARY embraces a vocabulary which will be found to be, alike in ancient and in modern words, much more extensive than that of any existing dictionary.

THE OXFORD ENGLISH DICTIONARY in the present volume, of which A fills 603, B 637 pages, contains the words beginning with the letters A and B, comprising 31,254 words, not reckoning the simple combinations of obvious meaning, such as air-current, air-passage, which are practically unlimited.

TIMES, March 12, 1886.

This monumental work........Never before has the English language been treated lexicographically in a manner so truly comprehensive and scientific, and rarely has the University of Oxford lent the resources of its celebrated press to a work more worthy of its ancient renown.

NOTES AND QUERIES.

The Dictionary is, indeed, in the highest sense national, and will go far to raise the general estimate of English scholarship.

SATURDAY REVIEW.

As for criticism, in the ordinary sense, there can be no question of it. The Dictionary will itself be the greatest monument of English philological criticism ever constructed.

INSTANTES TYRANNI.

MORE than one or two things that have recently happened, including the Southampton, Ayr, and Thanet elections, have drawn, or should draw, very serious attention to the growing and most mischievous tyranny of fads. A week or two ago we showed how an infinitesimal number of voters, dexterously manipulated by the advocates of free-trade in disease, had prevailed on Government after Government, against the clearest teachings of science, the unanimous dictates of experience and common sense, and the soundest principles of religion, to let loose on England and on India a plague which for some time had been in process of staying. But the advocates of the inalienable right of woman to spread pestilence as she chooses are but a handful, and their success is only an illustration of the power of impudence on one side against weakness and pusillanimity on the other. At present we take in hand a much larger and more formidable evil. The mania for temperance, falsely so-called, has for many years been accorded the sort of contemptuous toleration which is often shown to what seem to be well-intentioned and not particularly harmful crazes. It may be frankly granted that in itself it stands on a different footing from the loathsome lunacy just referred to. Its complete triumph would be a triumph of folly, a diminution of the harmless pleasures of life, a serious inconvenience to financiers, and a very unjustifiable restriction on personal freedom; but that is all. Not a little actual harm, though not nearly so much as it has become the common cant to assert, does undoubtedly come of immoderate drinking; and, whether actual harm comes of it or not, it is also beyond doubt morally, theologically, and rationally condemnable. So the temperance fanatics were allowed their toleration with the usual want of foresight. There are some things which, if tolerated, are sure to persecute their tolerators, and of such is the temperance movement.

The pitch of incivism—to use a word too convenient not to deserve naturalization—to which a fad can drive faddists has rarely been better illustrated than in the events of the last three or four weeks. We have seen persistent temperance propaganda achieve the reversal of the verdict of one large constituency, play a great part in the reversal of that of another, and threaten, at least, to influence a third. The result of the Thanet election will not be known till some time after we write; but it has been asserted, and not contradicted, that a body of six or seven hundred electors has been guided in its vote solely by a consideration which has absolutely nothing to do with the duty of a voter properly understood. Still more remarkable is the lesson of the licensing clauses of the Local Government Bill. There, to please this faction of avowed bad citizens (for there can be no worse citizenship than the preference of a private fad to the public good), we saw a powerful Government go out of its way to attempt an unnecessary and dangerous administrative change. The bad citizens not being satisfied, we have seen the heads of a great party in Opposition swallow at a gulp, and without straining, their own solemn pledges and the principles of common justice, and in consequence of this we have seen further the Government compelled (with no loss to the nation, perhaps, but certainly with some loss of credit to itself) to drop its attempt to conciliate the irreconcilable. The last few days, too, have offered more than one individual and private instance of the complete forgetfulness of reason and decency which this intoxication of non-intoxication induces in its victims. Few men have worked better for the Union or borne more abuse in their work for it than Mr. CAINE. Yet we have had Mr. CAINE openly declaring that he is a temperance man first and a Unionist afterwards, or, in other words, that he sets his own theory of irregular verbs above the life-and-death interests of his country. This is at best, it may be said, a logical inconsistency; but we can produce a much more glaring practical one. On Thursday last Sir ARTHUR BLACKWOOD presided at a meeting, at which resolutions were passed denouncing the opium trade, the drink traffic (with native races, it is true, but that is, as all true abstainers would admit, a detail), and the "Government "license of sin" in India. Sir ARTHUR denounced these three practices as "crimes," as "sins for which all members "of Christian Churches were responsible." Now we turn to Whitaker's Almanack, and we find that Sir ARTHUR BLACKWOOD is a servant of a Government which is directly responsible for the first and third of these practices, and we find that he receives 2,000*l.* a year from a revenue which is very largely made up of profits from drink traffic, not, indeed, with native races, but with Englishmen. It might have been thought that a Government servant was bound not to denounce "Government practices"; that, if he thought them "crimes" and "sins," he should shake off, not merely the dust, but the comfortable thick clay of 2,000*l.* a year which he is accumulating in the service of SATAN. But, apparently, Sir ARTHUR BLACKWOOD, unless there are two pillars in the Evangelical party of that name, is not of this severe consistency. He makes the best of both worlds. He denounces, and eke he draws.

We find, we confess, but little fault with him, and we do not think his conduct one whit more blamable than the conduct of those who, not being servants of Government, but only English citizens, prostitute their civic privileges to the service of a foolish, an irreligious, and to a great extent a mischievous, fad. What we desire to do is to call serious attention, if it be not too late, to the dangerous tyranny which has been allowed to invade English social and political life. Fortunately, though the number of the enemy is much larger than in the case of the Contagious Diseases Acts, the forces available for resistance are also incomparably stronger. By far the larger part of the nation has not yet bowed the knee to the BAAL of temperance, and though temperance advocates are at least as reckless as our modern untori or plague-disseminators, they cannot bring against their foes the same disgraceful calumnies as these can. But it is quite time that the organized nuisance were met by some organized remedy. No body of persons is more open to public opinion than the upper clergy of the Church of England, and it is time that pressure were put on bishops and dignitaries to make them abandon the scandalous coquetting with the temperance mania, of which too many of them have recently been guilty. The courageous words of the Indian Commander-in-Chief the other day ought to be echoed through the army by all officers who hate cant. Employers of labour can discourage by all legitimate means, though of course not by the boycotting which total abstainers practise, the spread of the disease among their workmen. All those who have the control of moral training can inculcate the truth that, while drunkenness is a bad thing, total abstinence is not a good one, and the forcing of total abstinence on others is as bad as drunkenness itself. The general public can refuse to support institutions which substitute childish and unhealthy restraint for rational liberty. Above all, it is in the power of the majority of electors to free candidates from the odious and degrading tyranny to which they are at present subjected. It is as patriotic to refuse to vote for a man who sets fad above country as it is unpatriotic to refuse to vote for a man who sets country above fad. The genus candidate is not in itself avid of pledges; and as soon as the mass of constituencies decide to be no longer dictated to by a small faction of maniacs, the strength of the evil will be broken at once. In no place in the United Kingdom, probably, could a temperance candidate triumph with only temperance [illegible], and a general understanding on both sides would very soon make the temperance card a sure losing one, instead of a possible trump to any player who does not mind foul play. There ought to be the less difficulty about this because the very events which we have been discussing have shown to both sides what rotten reeds the temperance vote and the temperance candidates are. For the present it pleases them to qualify their water with Home Rule, but both Mr. PARNELL and Mr. GLADSTONE (who, whatever else be thought of them, are at least practised Parliamentary managers) know that this alliance is perfectly untrustworthy. The whole strength of these public curses lies in the lazy good-nature of the great stupid public, which is partly deceived by the respectability of ostensible motive, and partly too indolent to thwart anybody who is determined and unscrupulous. But even this public, if it looks at such things as the Registration of Clubs Bill, to which Lord WEMYSS called attention the other day, may convince itself that very unpleasant times are in store for it, if it does not knock the temperance old-man-of-the-sea's brains out for him at once. If it is to be solemnly declared that it is expedient "to regulate" by law "the proceedings of "persons associating themselves for purposes of social in-"tercourse and recreation," the venerable delusions that an Englishman's house is his castle and that this is a free country had better be got rid of at once.

ARMY MANAGEMENT.

IT is not to be expected that last week's talk on Mr. HANBURY's motion will have a better fate than usually befalls discussions on military management in Committee of Supply. Unquestionably it will go down to the dead in the files of old newspapers, where lie entombed the reports of sermons, as the Bishop of PETERBOROUGH has explained. And yet it deserved to be printed apart, with a commentary. Not that the matter or form of the discussion was particularly good. The speakers were as inconclusive and straggling as they are wont to be in Committee, and the facts were only sufficiently brought out to show that they were discreditable. With Mr. HANBURY's own speech there is no fault to be found. It told a tale of certain mismanagement and possible dishonesty plainly enough, but from the moment he finished the talk straggled off, according to precedent, into official platitude and unofficial fog. In the present state of the evidence it is as good as useless to discuss the worth or worthlessness of what was said for or against Colonels BARRINGTON and RAWNSLEY or Captain PLUNKETT, who "was frightfully unpopular." It is enough that the following facts are accepted as proved by the War Office itself. Officers of proved incompetence have been appointed to do work they had not been trained to, after failure in other places. An old firm, which had long supplied Government, has been, for reasons good, struck off the list of contractors. A man who had been in their employ, or was in some other way connected with them, has been engaged as a Government viewer. In this capacity he favoured his old friends unduly, and passed bad work. He is still in Government employ. Two old servants in the Store Department who were employed as viewers at a pinch, and did their work very well, were set aside in favour of an outsider, brought in by this very man. When on their evidence—given on very intelligible motives, perhaps, but proved to be sound—the Government took action to amend certain scandals, it found nobody to punish except the contractors and a Sergeant HAWKINS, a very subordinate person. It does not seem that the higher officials under whose noses the mischief went on have been a penny the worse for it. Though they allowed bad stores to be passed, it has not been imputed to them. All Mr. STANHOPE has to say is that it all happened a long time ago and before his day. Now it is otherwise, and there are more viewers, which makes us quite safe.

Really we do not hear the assurance with any considerable confidence. The whole story is a pretty illustration of what comes of the practice of laying all upon "the system." If a few years ago, while the bad stores were being actually passed, a man had questioned the Government as to what it was doing to secure a good supply, he would have been told that the firms dealing with Government were of high respectability; that there were viewers and responsible officials whose competence and honesty were not to be doubted; and, finally, of course, that HER MAJESTY's Ministers must be responsible—a statement to which the Ministerial mind can see no answer. It would have sounded very well in 1885; and yet we now know that firms of the highest respectability were earning loss of their place on the list of contractors, that viewers were passing bad goods, that competent officials were being hoodwinked, and that responsible Ministers were unable to prevent the waste of public money. The story moves the unofficial mind to ask two questions. First, what guarantee have we that more viewers means better viewers, or that a few changes of places and titles under the name of reorganization will make it sure that superior officials will not, from want of knowledge, allow inferior to misconduct themselves? The second is what does the word responsibility mean? It certainly cannot be from mere want of officials that bad stores are passed. Indeed, it is acknowledged that they were passed corruptly by inferiors and ignorantly by superiors. We fail to see why the appointment of a few more hands should make this impossible in future. As for the second question, it is a standing puzzle. Responsibility we take to mean liability to punishment for misconduct or incompetence. But nobody has been punished except the irresponsible contractors, and even they have not had to stand an action for breach of contract. To the Ministers of the day it is notorious that their mismanagement has done no visible harm. Now, as long as human nature remains in its present corrupt and fallen state, we know that there can be no absolute security against stupidity, ignorance, and dishonesty; but some relative security may be obtained. Neither is it difficult to see how to obtain it. The obvious method is to make responsibility real. When somebody has been smartly punished for incompetence, others who know nothing about the work will be less ready to take the post—or will take care to acquire the necessary knowledge. It is beyond dispute that much technical work has been, and for all we know to the contrary still is, superintended by gentlemen very ignorant of its nature. Such superintendence is no better than a sham. Sir W. MARRIOTT, profiting by recent experience, deprecates any imitation of the justice of the Cadi which kills somebody at random whenever a crime has been committed. The Cadi is not a model to follow; but really when bad stores have been passed through the neglect of the official whose duty it is to test them, it is not so hard to find who ought to eat stick. There is, however, a higher responsibility which it is most desirable to bring home. It is the responsibility continually pleaded by Ministers in the full knowledge that the word has no real meaning for them. Lord WOLSELEY has just explained to the Select Committee on Army Estimates how Ministers who are bound to think of the efficiency of the Army Reserve have seriously risked it in order to save a little money. Will any of them be called to account for the mischief which may ensue? Mr. STANHOPE, also, excused the passing of bad stores in 1885 and 1886 by saying that, the supply having fallen very low, it had to be made up at a pinch so hurriedly that the viewers were overworked and could not do their duty properly. We do not think that this excuses the official who ought to have refused to certify to the quality of goods which he had not examined. But, no doubt, the great sinners were the Ministers who allowed the stores to be depleted. None of them have been called to account, that we know of. After all our chopping and changing, all our rummagings, rearrangings, and reorganizations, there is no security that exactly the same kind of mismanagement may not be committed again, with equally bad effects. To take an example, of which Mr. STANHOPE will feel the full force—when the reduction of the Royal Horse Artillery is shown by experiment, as it has already been amply shown by argument, to be a gross blunder, will Mr. STANHOPE have to answer for it? Certainly not, unless our practice undergoes a wholesome change very briefly. Now this is the cause of mismanagement, false economy, and waste, which we wish to see changed by a telling example. When Ministers have been taught that they may some day pay smartly for having sacrificed the efficiency of the army in order to tide over a Parliamentary difficulty, they will begin to bethink themselves. The spread of that conviction would be worth a wilderness of reorganizations. There is no fear that we should fall into the mistake of the Cadi, and hang an innocent passer-by. There is no doubt as to who the offenders are.

Lord WOLSELEY's evidence before the Select Committee is full of instances of the unmilitary management of our army. Some of his opinions are to be received with caution. Few who do not look merely at the soldier's training, or who have not unworthy motives of a political nature, will agree with him in wishing to see all garrisons withdrawn from great towns. The Home Office, which has always opposed any such suggestion, could give very good reasons, drawn from the history of the Northern manufacturing towns within the last ten years, and of London itself within the last two, for preferring to keep a military force within easy call of the civil authorities. Even the apparently useless retention of a cavalry regiment at Brighton may be justified by the argument he himself uses to defend handsome uniforms. It tends to make the service popular, which is an important consideration in a volunteer army. But everybody must agree with the Adjutant-General in condemning the folly which leaves the reserve men without practice to keep up their drill. In order to avoid a little expense for pay and rations, the War Office has refused to call the reserve men out for a few days' yearly drill. It will not even allow them to qualify with a Volunteer battalion, because this would slightly increase the capitation-grant. A little money is saved, but the value of the first reserve is seriously lessened. No military experience is required to convince any man that four or five years' want of drill will make an infantry soldier rusty and a cavalry man very rusty indeed. By leaving the men the option of coming into barracks in winter, or practising with the Militia or Volunteers, this might be avoided, and some good might be done to the form of the Second Reserve.

THE AMERICAN PRESIDENCY.

THE contest for the Presidency between the two great American parties is now about to commence. The result will depend on the course which may be followed by a body of seceders from the Republican party, whose position in some respects resembles that of the Liberal-Unionists of England. The comparison must not be pushed too far, inasmuch as neither the Constitution of the United States nor the national existence is exposed to any present danger; but Mr. CLEVELAND's Republican supporters dissent on questions of principle from the policy and practice of their former leaders. At the election of 1884, Mr. CLEVELAND was preferred to Mr. BLAINE as the representative of upright and honest administration. The great mass on both sides voted with their respective parties; and Mr. BLAINE's thorough-going adherents were the more enthusiastic in his cause on the ground of his mastery of political organization. A more legitimate ground of preference consisted in his undoubted ability, and especially in his popular eloquence. The most conscientious Republicans only objected to his nomination because they were resolved to check the progress of corruption. Some of them may also have been repelled by the obstinate devotion of the party to the irrational cause of commercial protection; but the contest mainly turned on the question of Civil Service Reform. Mr. BLAINE was the ablest and most skilful practitioner of the arts which, in General JACKSON's words, appropriate the spoils to the victor. Mr. CLEVELAND held, on the contrary, that clerks and postmasters should be appointed and promoted for their honesty and capacity, and not because they professed to belong to any political party. The struggle was severe, and the success of the Democratic candidate excited some surprise. The Republicans had been in power for a quarter of a century, and all the posts in the Civil Service were occupied by their partisans; but the feeling, especially in the State of New York, against the established system of patronage was strong enough to bring the Democrats into office. Since that time the party which has been dominant for the time has probably received more than its proportionate share of employment; but, on the whole, Mr. CLEVELAND's consistency and impartiality have been generally recognized.

It would seem that the Democrats are, as might be expected, anxious to let the present contest turn on the issues which were four years ago decided in their favour. In his reply to the Notification Committee of the Democratic Convention Mr. CLEVELAND referred with marked emphasis to "the abuses "and extravagances which had," he says, before his term of office, "crept into the management of public affairs." "I "knew then something of the bitterness of partisan ob-"struction, but did not know how bitter, shameless, and "reckless it could be." It may be perhaps in conformity with precedent that a candidate in acknowledging his nomination abstains from discussing political questions; but Mr. CLEVELAND's reticence does not extend to the discharge of administrative duties, which forms his principal claim to the confidence of his countrymen. It is true that the Democratic platform, as framed at the St. Louis Convention, is almost as strictly confined to inoffensive commonplaces; but Mr. CLEVELAND had the opportunity of commenting on the voluminous creed which was propounded by the Republicans at Chicago. He is perhaps well advised in saying nothing on the dangerous question of a reform of the tariff. His own leaning has been plainly indicated in his recent Message to Congress; but no party, or powerful section of a party, is yet bold enough to profess a belief in the doctrine of Free-trade. The Republicans, who express their opinions in the strongest and plainest language, have in this matter a great advantage over their adversaries. The Republican platform pledges the party in the future as well as in the present to the sacred cause of Protection. Mr. BLAINE, who, notwithstanding his recent failure, is still the chief spokesman of the party, is excited to more than ordinary enthusiasm when he idealizes monopoly and the officious interference of the Legislature with private transactions. Mr. CLEVELAND's modest proposal to reduce taxation to the amount required for the public service, while it suggests a doubt as to his Protectionist orthodoxy, evokes no active sympathy even on the part of those who approve his policy. It may be hoped that he will succeed in concentrating the attention of doubtful voters on purity of administration. If he is at some disadvantage through the indefinite character of his fiscal policy, he may perhaps derive a certain amount of strength from his comparative personal celebrity. No one out of America, and not many American citizens, ever heard of Mr. HARRISON before he was nominated as Republican candidate for the Presidency. The fact that he is grandson to a former, and almost forgotten, President, who held office for six weeks, has perhaps less to do with his nomination than the total absence of any other claim to the highest dignity.

Except in the rare instances of a unanimous choice, the proceedings of nominating Conventions are much more amusing, if not more interesting, than the final trial of strength between the parties. Scarcely any foreigner would presume to understand the motives which determine the ultimate result of perhaps a dozen ballots. The disinterested spectator finds himself hopelessly puzzled by the progress of a game conducted according to rules which are to him an impenetrable secret. If he is acute and observant, he dimly perceives in the later stages of the game a TARQUIN-like process of cutting off the highest heads. Distinguished candidates are obnoxious to jealousy and sometimes to resentment; but at the beginning of the game they sometimes seem to enjoy a provisional preference. Mr. SHERMAN, who was the best known of the candidates if Mr. BLAINE was excluded from the list, stood for two or three days at the head of the poll. His majority rather increased than diminished; but, as soon as it reached a certain point, the experts who regulate the play decided, like military umpires at a sham-fight, that SHERMAN was out of the game. There was another element of uncertainty in the struggle in addition to the ordinary disadvantage which attends conspicuous candidates. In this instance the claims of notoriety were brought into sharp collision with the preference which is habitually awarded to inoffensive obscurity. Though Mr. BLAINE's name was seldom mentioned, he was the more thought of, and a well-organized band of election managers was all the time manœuvring to secure his nomination. In the early ballots he had ten or twelve votes out of six or seven hundred; but his partisans were not discouraged by divisions which they had probably arranged. Mr. SHERMAN's and Mr. DEPEW's names were perhaps understood to mean Mr. BLAINE; and it was hoped that the Republican "HENRY of Navarre," as his admirers call him, after the hero of MACAULAY's ballad, would profit by a practical demonstration that none of his competitors could win. Little attention was paid to Mr. BLAINE's repeated disclaimers of any desire for nomination. His protests probably meant that he was not disposed to run the risk of defeat; but his telegraphic messages proved that he would serve if he were unanimously chosen. On the last day, after all other presentable candidates, with the exception of Mr. BLAINE, had been eliminated, his supporters seem to have thought that, if his name were suddenly proposed to the Convention, he would cause what is called in the language of Conventions a "stampede." In other words, he was in a moment of surprise to be chosen by acclamation; but the propounders of the scheme found that they were not a majority. The rest of the delegates, with a loyal resolution to obey the instructions of their constituents, held that it was their duty to nominate a candidate who was likely to win, and that Mr. BLAINE would not satisfy the condition. Accordingly, they resolved, after a consultation, that Mr. HARRISON should be chosen, apparently because, being almost wholly unknown, he was less exposed than any of his competitors to envy or ill will. If he is elected he will furnish a second instance of the selection of two Presidents from the same family. The precedent of the two ADAMSES has not hitherto been followed; but there is no reason why such a pedigree should operate as a disqualification. Mr. HARRISON has held some considerable posts, and in the war he served with credit, and attained the rank of a brigadier-general of volunteers. He will receive the votes of all who would have supported Mr. BLAINE, and the dissentient Republicans cannot allege that he is identified with the cause of corruption.

The Republican platform or programme is unusually long, and it is ostentatiously patriotic. The PRESIDENT is attacked for his alleged surrender of the fisheries, which consisted of his acceptance of large concessions made, with the assent of the Canadian Government, by the English Commissioners. There is, in the Republican as in the Democratic platform, an ungracious and officious declaration of sympathy with the policy of Mr. GLADSTONE and Mr. PARNELL. The Republican appeal to the Irish voters is somewhat more candid than the rival declaration, because it is combined with professions of hostility to England in the matter of the fisheries. The friends of the Union have never disputed the existence of sympathy between their domestic and their foreign ill-wishers. The implied threat would be more formidable if unfriendly language were primarily addressed to those who purport to be its objects. It is certain that the offensive paragraphs are mainly addressed to Irish voters. It is not at present known whether the allies of the Irish Nationalists will support Mr. CLEVELAND or Mr. HARRISON. Their prejudices are not likely to incline them to the cause of electoral purity; but, on the other hand, they have hitherto been allied with the Democrats, and it is not known that the organization has been dissolved. Mr. BLAINE has courted the Irish with perseverance and perhaps with success, but it is doubtful whether he can transfer their votes from himself to Mr. HARRISON. The significance of a Presidential election is perhaps exaggerated in the estimation of foreigners. The President cannot legislate, except negatively by means of his veto. His internal administration only concerns his own countrymen, and in the conduct of external affairs he is directed and controlled by the Senate. Mr. HARRISON, though he has not thus far achieved fame, may probably, like many of his less-known predecessors, rise to his situation if he is elected. Mr. GARFIELD and Mr. ARTHUR both acquired a reputation as Presidents. Mr. HAYES was, as a politician, of a similar rank. When the Irish vote is no longer needed, the President of the time will probably cultivate friendly relations with England.

THE FUNCTION OF CATS.

A MERCIFUL Providence is metaphorically said to have made the back of the domestic cat exceeding broad, in exquisite adaptation to the moral load which that anatomical structure has to carry. We all know that most fires are due to cats. Cats are culpably careless in the use of matches. Even Messrs. BRYANT & MAY have scarcely been able, by their excellent and ingenious invention, to correct the influences of feline rashness. It is a far too common thing for a cat, after lighting a cigar, to throw a wax vesta or a deadly fusee upon the carpet or the bare boards. These animals will leave candles in immediate proximity to curtains, and forget all about them in an exciting chase after mice that have as much right to live as themselves. A cat has been known to turn on the gas, and then, hearing a scratching behind the wainscot, to become absorbed for half an hour before applying the flame, with consequences which can be imagined, and, therefore, if Mr. HENRY JAMES will pardon us for saying so, need not be described. Cats, too, are addicted to the pernicious practice of smoking in bed, especially Persian cats, who cannot otherwise perform their allotted task of reading through the Arabian Nights twice a year. Now, as it is notorious that no cat will endure a cover to his pipe, we need not point out the great dangers we are in by this unhappy levity. But there is really no end to the responsibility of cats, who are without any sense of shame, and appear to be most imperfectly acquainted with the laws which govern the ignition of inflammable bodies. How many fires they cause in London from January to December Captain SHAW alone knows. It is only necessary to mention their too familiar habit of saving themselves trouble by carrying hot coals in a shovel from one room to another; for on this occasion we may avoid the painful topic of the frauds which they too often perpetrate at the expense of insurance Companies. When all these things are taken into consideration, we need not wonder, however deeply we may be grieved, at the number of fires whose origin is assigned in official reports to the agency of these noxious and ubiquitous quadrupeds. But we may venture to express our regret that Captain SHAW should have omitted all mention of them in the learned disquisition on fires which he has contributed to Murray's Magazine for July. Cats are a powerful interest, and in the prevailing flabbiness of public opinion few have the moral courage to speak the truth about them.

Excellent is the spirit of Dr. Low, an officer of the Local Government Board, who merits the respect and gratitude of the whole community for having brought out the facts about cats without flinching. No cat, after the publication of Dr. Low's memorandum, can shelter himself behind the miserable plea of ignorance from the duty of at once answering the charge that, whatever may be his recreations and amusements, his serious business in life is the spread of diphtheria. It is the more courageous in Dr. Low to state this because certain Irish-American cats are more than suspected of having attempted to blow up the premises of the Local Government Board with dynamite about five years ago. Undeterred by these lucid memories, Dr. Low charges into the ranks of our feline tyrants with desperate determination. He accuses them, not by insinuation or innuendo, but in plain and unmistakable terms, of having caused an epidemic of diphtheria at Ealing. The method in which this detestable plot was carried out is truly diabolical. A number of associated cats, whom Dr. Low, for obvious reasons, abstains from naming, conspired to eat the remnants of the food, and drink the remainder of the milk, which had been served to diphtheritic patients. Thus primed for their horrible work, they selected a number of healthy children, with whom they began to play. The children were particularly attentive to the cats, because the cats appeared to be unwell. Such is the lot of children, who never tease animals, though animals are constantly teasing them. We draw a veil over the sequel, merely remarking that Dr. Low, as becomes his high position, has no doubt that the children were infected in this precise way. The Standard treats the painful subject in a reprehensibly frivolous spirit, even suggesting that cabs, railway carriages, bank-notes, and library books are as bad as cats. The germs of infection are, it is to be feared, everywhere, and life would become impossible if we were always speculating on the chances of coming within the grasp of disease. Meanwhile it is desirable that criminal cats should be brought to justice, and that contaminated articles—edible, potable, or otherwise—should be destroyed.

THE CHANNEL TUNNEL.

SOME alarm was caused by a positive and inaccurate statement that the Government had resolved to treat the construction of the Channel Tunnel as an open question. It is satisfactory to find that Sir EDWARD WATKIN'S chief convert is not Lord SALISBURY, but Mr. GLADSTONE. By a curious coincidence Sir EDWARD WATKIN was absent from the division on Tuesday. It is true that some statesmen of authority, including the late and the present Earl of DERBY, have given a more or less definite approval to Sir EDWARD WATKIN'S speculation; but every intelligent Englishman is as competent as the most experienced Minister to appreciate the arguments for and against the scheme. In favour of the project it is alleged that the proposed outlay will be profitable to the undertakers. The chief promoter is undoubtedly a capable judge of capital, expenditure, and of traffic; but he has observed a curious silence on the commercial question. Sir EDWARD WATKIN must appreciate at their true value the sentimental considerations which are suggested for the benefit, not of intending shareholders, but of philanthropic enthusiasts and simpletons. That the conversion of Great Britain from an island to a peninsula would stimulate reciprocal goodwill between France and England is one of those propositions which, though they may influence votes, are not noticed by serious disputants. France and Germany are not at present united by feelings of attachment and sympathy, though they have no Channel between them. Trade between England and France has in modern times, through the employment of steam and the improvement of ships and harbours, and, above all, in consequence of the introduction of railways on both sides of the Channel, received a far greater extension of facilities than any additional accommodation which could be supplied by a Tunnel. If the express goods trains in France were accelerated to the English rate of speed, more time would be saved than by the avoidance of transhipment. A more liberal French tariff would, without cost or trouble, increase the trade between the countries more abundantly than any mechanical improvement. Yet all these actual or possible changes have in no degree diminished the acrimonious feeling which the French have inherited from former generations. A French admiral of high rank has announced that, in case of war, Brighton and Eastbourne and all the open towns on the English coast would be bombarded, on the ground that England is too odious to be entitled to the benefits of international law and usage.

The commercial advantages of the Tunnel need neither be disputed nor admitted; but the importance of pecuniary gain is incommensurable with even a remote risk of national danger. The reasons against the enterprise are conclusive, unless they can be exhaustively refuted. England has by deliberate choice determined to remain virtually unarmed, while the Continent is organized as a series of camps, occupied by vast regular armies. The conscription, which alone could make this island invulnerable, will neither be adopted nor even seriously proposed. The consequence is that nothing but the narrow seas and the navy stand between this country and an irresistible invasion. When the population of France was double that of England, it was only at distant intervals that the possible landing of a French army caused serious alarm. The United Kingdom will soon be as populous as France, but the regular French army is tenfold larger than the English. Even at the beginning of the current century the best professional judges of military affairs believed that, if NAPOLEON could have landed with 100,000 men, he would have occupied London, and perhaps conquered England. It is true that, including militia and Volunteers, there were a million of Englishmen under arms; but the contingent of regular soldiers was comparatively insignificant. The fatal objection to a Channel Tunnel is that it would in certain circumstances provide a highway by which an invading French army might receive unlimited reinforcements. It would also secure the undisturbed retreat which might otherwise be intercepted by the English fleet. The chance of being cut off from his communications was the greatest danger which NAPOLEON can have apprehended. The existence of a Tunnel would have supplied a motive for incurring a temporary hazard of isolation. He may have been justified in his belief that the invasion would become practicable if he could command the Channel for a few hours; but he must have foreseen that he would be separated from his base of operations. He probably intended to march straight upon London, but the existence of a Tunnel would have diverted his attack to Dover. The fortress, however strong, would not be impregnable, and the invader who might take the place would be master of England.

It may be answered that before an invading army could have landed, the northern end of the Tunnel would be destroyed; but the restoration of a free passage would be the work of a short time, perhaps of a few days. Sir EDWARD WATKIN says that it could be flooded in three minutes, and pumped dry again in three months. A French general in occupation of the ground could well afford to wait for a longer time. It is not even certain that the most obvious precaution would be taken. Perhaps demagogues and effeminate peacemongers would protest against a hasty measure, which might, as they would contend, be a provocation to France. It is probable, but not certain, that the independence and existence of the nation would be regarded as paramount to minor considerations. In practice it might perhaps matter little whether the advance of an enemy would be delayed by a temporary interruption of his future thoroughfare. When the difficulty was eventually overcome, he would have only to deal with two or three regular corps d'armée and with a crowd of half-trained troops. The English fleet would be useless against an enemy in possession of both shores of the Channel and of the connecting passage. Even if the amount of danger is exaggerated by alarmists, a greater or a less chance of national ruin would be equally inadmissible. It is enough to know that England would be at the mercy of an invader who had by any means got possession of the Tunnel. The possible contingency will be gladly recognized by at least one section of politicians. Irish Nationalists will not conceal their approval of a scheme which would open a road to a foreign enemy. English sedition would be less violent or less outspoken; but it may be remembered that when the French army of invasion was quartered at Boulogne, Fox declared that he would not aid in any defensive measures, because he saw no reason for preferring the despotism of GEORGE III. to the despotism of BONAPARTE. It is not likely that party passion would at the present find so cynical an expression; but in the calculation of political possibilities, as in the discussion of material conditions of warfare, even remote dangers should be taken into consideration if they might in certain contingencies be fatal.

The capture of the English end of the Tunnel by an invading enemy is not the only method by which he might take advantage of its construction. A country which is dependent on the importation of food from abroad is liable, if it loses the command of the sea, to be starved into submission. It is true that the maritime resources of England are almost incalculable; nor is it suggested that they would be insufficient for the defence of trade, as well as of the coasts and harbours of the kingdom; but in this case also a prudent Government will refuse to incur any risk which may be prevented. The possession of Dover would certainly be a condition of any treaty which might be dictated by a victorious enemy. To the objection that food might be imported in neutral vessels, it is a sufficient answer that a Power which was dominant at sea would pay little respect to the Declaration of Paris, or to any other restriction of its hostile policy. The French in Tonquin declared that rice was contraband of war; and wheat might be similarly treated. A surrender under pressure of famine would in any case be a grievous disaster, but the misfortune might not be irremediable if the English shores were still only accessible by sea. The main reason for prohibiting the construction of the Tunnel is so conclusive that it is hardly necessary to dwell on other objections, though they might be sufficient in themselves. Even the advocates of the project admit that it would be necessary to protect the end of the Tunnel by a fortress, which would of course require a suitable garrison. There is probably no instance recorded in history in which provisions for the attack and defence of the same position have been simultaneously made. The Tunnel would practically give access to any part of England, unless it were effectually commanded by the fortifications which are to be constructed. A siege might perhaps not be necessary; and in any case it might be successful. The unopposed occupation of the works by the enemy, in pursuance of a capitulation, cannot be imagined without humiliation; but JULES FAVRE may possibly not be the last negotiator who has to withdraw the refusal of a vital concession. If there had been an impregnable access to Metz and to Strasburg, BISMARCK and MOLTKE would have insisted on its cession; but the parallel is not exact, because the French army is, in ordinary times, a match for the German, while England could offer no resistance to half a million of foreign troops.

THE SPEECH FROM THE GERMAN THRONE.

THE favourable impression created by the Emperor WILLIAM'S general Proclamation, as contrasted with his addresses to the army and navy, has been well maintained by the Speech from the Throne at the opening of the Reichstag. The contents of that speech may be fairly divided into two parts, the one dealing with general professions and with the domestic policy of the Empire and the Kingdom, the other with the foreign relations of Germany. The latter part, no doubt, is of the greatest interest, but the former is by no means uninteresting. In both the general tone is unexceptionable, and it is gratifying to see that the mean between pointed slighting of the short and necessarily colourless reign which has just been closed and undue dwelling upon it has been hit with judicious adroitness. The sternest and most punctilious constitutionalist cannot find anything to object to in WILLIAM II.'s references to the Constitution; and, if the declaration of adhesion to the policy of a modified State Socialism raises a sigh in the breast of any lingering lover of laissez-faire, that lonely one may be a little comforted by the remembrance that something of the sort was necessary to counterbalance the unequivocal announcement of the EMPEROR's determination to "oppose firmly all efforts having the aim and tendency to "undermine public order," and by the promise to support national and social development within the paths of legality. These things, no doubt, are the commonplaces of all such speech; but, if it is possible to exaggerate their import as they appear, it is certain that the omission of them would have been considered, if it had not actually been, of evil omen. Moreover, Prussia and Germany have those two greatest securities for internal as well as for external tranquillity which Prince EUGENE impressed in vain on the author of the Pragmatic Sanction in words to which, if another Emperor of Germany had attended, it is not impossible that the present German EMPEROR would never have sat upon his present throne—a formidable army and a well-filled treasury.

These guarantees no doubt apply with even greater force abroad, but they rather increase than lessen the interest with which the EMPEROR's words as to foreign policy must be regarded. These words contain no reference to England, and only a distant and dubious reference to France. But with these Powers the German Empire has no very close relations. There is little or nothing that is equivocal in the distinct paragraphs allotted to Austria, to Italy, and to Russia. A certain obscurity, indeed, hangs over one of the reasons which the EMPEROR gives for his determination to maintain the alliance with Austria, and Austrians might perhaps think the reference to 1866 better away. But the declaration of adherence with "German fidelity" to the publicly known alliance with Austria-Hungary—especially following as it does at short distance the hint that an attack on the allies of the Empire has equal force, as a "necessity of "war," with an attack on the Empire itself—is unmistakable. The reference to Italy is less precise, but not less friendly. But it is, of course, the Russian paragraph that will have attracted most attention. It is rather curiously worded; the EMPEROR announcing, as if to relieve apprehension, that "his engagements with Austria and Italy permit him to "cultivate his personal friendship for the Emperor of "RUSSIA and the peaceful relations which have existed for a "century with the Russian Empire, and which correspond "with his own feelings and with the interests of Germany." On the whole, and considering certain recent utterances of Prince BISMARCK's, this can hardly be said to be what the language of diplomacy calls "chalorous." Not only are personal feelings and historical connexion somewhat weak bonds, but it would appear that circumstances present themselves to the EMPEROR's mind in which his agreements with other Powers would not permit this desirable and simultaneous cultivation of the pleasures of friendship and the study of history.

Much, no doubt, will depend upon the impression produced at St. Petersburg by this cautious declaration of affection; or perhaps it would be more correct to say by the private explanations which may have accompanied or may be going to follow it. But it can hardly be too much to hope that, for the moment, at any rate, it negatives the idea, which was openly entertained in some quarters, of a direct rapprochement between Russia and Germany, or even of a return to something like the Dreikaiserbund. The speech, in its clear and almost ostentatious presentation of the other Triple Alliance of Germany-Austria-Italy, which took the place of the former, manifests an adherence to more than the tradition of the speaker's grandfather and namesake. Then, too, the personal affection of the German and Russian sovereigns, and perhaps that rather shadowy historical connexion here spoken of, maintained the amity of the two Powers in spite of, at times, a very distinct divergence of views and interests. If there is a difference, it may be said to be chiefly marked by the new EMPEROR's careful and diversely reiterated assurance that at home and abroad, by the arts of peace as well as by the arms of war, he will seek to promote the well-being of Germany and that well-being only. Such a declaration ought to be superfluous; but, in view of the crazes of modern times, it is necessary perhaps and certainly salutary. Germany announces, in fact, that, with all due respect to law and treaties, and all proper wishes for the prosperity of others, she fights for her own hand. So must every nation which hopes to keep its place and its power in the welter of political chances and interests. There is no reasonable cause for umbrage in France at the allusion—very faint if it is an allusion—to the retention at all hazards of the gains of 1870. For even Frenchmen, unreasonable as they often are, have too often practised the good old rule not to understand it. For England the speech conveys not perhaps a warning, but certainly a lesson. Its spirit, we may hope, animates our present rulers; it most certainly did not animate those who lately directed the affairs of England. And it may be questioned whether it is thoroughly understood by some who would very warmly and justly repudiate belief in Mr. GLADSTONE. As an instance of the muddle prevailing in the English mind, some remarks made during this very week in the Times on the Sikkim difficulty may be referred to. It is, it seems, for London, not for Calcutta, to decide what the form, the extent, and the duration of the operations against the Thibetans shall be. That is to say, it is for the persons who do not know, not for the persons who do; for those away from the spot, not for those on it; for politicians who balance votes, not for governors who rule peoples; for considerations of the odd man in the lobby, not for simple estimates of military and administrative necessity. That is not the way in which the British Empire has been built up, and it is certainly not the spirit of the speech from the German throne. It has, indeed, not yet fallen to Germany to have a large colonial, as she already has a large domestic and European, policy; but, when it does so fall, we may be pretty sure that the policy of putting the best men in place and then leaving them to do the best—subject, of course, to responsibility if they fail—will be pursued. That, pushed in his case to a somewhat brutal extent, no doubt, was the policy of FREDERIC, and so long as Germany flourishes it will, we may be sure, be the policy of FREDERIC's successors.

This, however, is a digression. Subject to the chances of politics, it may be assumed that the policy of the new German reign, as indicated in this speech, certainly does not favour any immediate offensive movement on the Russian side in Europe. The rebuff—to speak less positively, the absence of encouragement—may dispose the CZAR to further complete quiescence, or it may yet more incline him to that policy of compensation for disappointments in the West by enterprise in the East upon which some Russians so warmly insist. In either case, it is the plainest duty of England, to make herself as strong as possible in the quarters where she is most threatened, and incidentally to lose no opportunity of suppressing such disturbances on the Indian frontier as those of Sikkim and among the border tribes beyond Abbotabad. The protection of the Turkish Empire in Europe, once the first object, has not so much become the second as it has been transferred to other hands. It is now a vital interest of the Austrian Empire that, whatever further disintegration of the SULTAN's territories takes place, that disintegration shall not turn to the advantage of Russia. And in looking to this Austria has the assurance of the German EMPEROR that an attack on his allies is an attack on him. England (whether unfortunately or not is not the present question) has no immediate backing of this kind to look to; but indirectly the situation, by relieving her of part of her duties in one place, sets her free, not to be idle, but the better to attend to them in the other.

THE NATIONAL GALLERY.

MR. GOSCHEN did not give much encouragement to the Trustees of the National Gallery last week. The suspension of the annual grant since the purchase of the two great pictures from Blenheim has had a disastrous effect. A large number of important collections have recently come to the hammer, and it cannot be said that prices have been high except in a few cases. Yet picture after picture is being picked up and despatched to Berlin or New York, and the National Gallery is too much crippled in its resources to be able to bid. It is, of course, alleged that a similar arrangement was made when the PEEL collection was purchased. But this is only half true; because, though the arrangement was made—and excited a good deal of indignation at the time—it was not strictly acted upon. The grant of 10,000*l.* a year was, it is true, withheld, but the Treasury again and again made special grants to the Trustees before the annual payment was resumed. Sir WILLIAM GREGORY writes an admirable, if somewhat long-winded, letter to the Times of Wednesday, in which he asserts that as much as 19,000*l*. was advanced to the Trustees at this time, and that no single application was refused. In the case of the PEEL purchase, also, the Trustees entered into the arrangement with their eyes open. They agreed to the two conditions—namely, that they should acquiesce in the sequestration of the grant; and that from time to time they should signify to the Treasury the names of desirable works. When the Ansidei "Madonna" and the VANDYCK "King Charles" were bought no conditions were made—that is, before the conclusion of the bargain recommended by the Trustees; but afterwards the same two conditions were imposed on them, with this very serious difference, however, that they were offered no choice in the matter, and that their recommendations have not been attended to, with certain exceptions, which, in fact, rather accentuate the situation. A wretched balance—of what sum we are not informed—amounting to 2,000*l*., was found and handed over to the Gallery last year; and though the beautiful portrait of the Duke of LENNOX and his dog—of which, if we mistake not, Sir EDWIN LANDSEER said, "I wish I could paint a dog like "that!"—has gone to America, two blanks have been filled up by the purchase of the (very ugly) "Card Players" of NICHOLAS MAAS, and the VAN DER HELST portrait. No one who saw ROMNEY'S marvellous sketch of Lady HAMILTON "reading NELSON'S despatch after the Battle of the Nile" can help regretting that Mr. GOSCHEN would not permit the Trustees to buy it at CHRISTIE'S last month. We are very deficient in adequate examples of Sir JOSHUA REYNOLDS'S female portraits, but the Treasury has refused the grant necessary for the purchase of one recently offered at a moderate price. Just at present there are exceptional chances for the acquisition of good pictures. A large number of old private collections are and have lately been in the market, owing to the operation of a recent Act affecting heirlooms and entails; and this is exactly the opportunity seized by the Treasury, not for filling up vacancies on the walls of the National Gallery, but for shutting up the purse altogether. The very things we most want go abroad; and when the present dispersal of family goods has ceased, we may find ourselves with money, indeed, but without the opportunities now so frequently occurring for laying it out to advantage. Moreover, of those pictures which have not gone out of the country a certain proportion will, no doubt, be offered to the Trustees, but at greatly increased prices, so that the present policy is imprudent, to say the least. One point, moreover, cannot be too strongly insisted upon—namely, that grants for such purposes as this are immensely popular with the whole country, and are never refused by the House of Commons. Lord BEACONSFIELD knew this fact and acted on it, as many a valuable purchase now in the Gallery shows. Mr. GOSCHEN cannot make a greater (political) mistake than to starve the public interest in the improvement of the National Gallery. A show of liberality in this respect would redound to the credit and popularity of the Government to a degree out of all proportion to the small sum it would cost the Treasury.

ON THE WAY TO PARIS.

THERE are two classes of persons who desire to travel between London and Paris. The first are those who wish to do the journey with the least possible trouble. The second are those who wish to do it with the least possible expense. Both are entitled to be well served for their money. For the first, nature and the Railway Companies have provided the routes by Dover and Calais and by Folkestone and Boulogne. The second can use the Newhaven and Dieppe or the Southampton and Havre lines. Of these last there is not much to say; for, from the nature of things, they will always be an alternative and a second best. People who enjoy the sea may prefer the five hours of boat from Newhaven to Dieppe to the one from Dover to Calais. Others may think that beauty of scenery compensates for length of journey. From their own point of view they are right, and when the utmost has been done to improve the more direct route, it will never run through anything so good to look at as Normandy. Still the merit of a journey is its speed, particularly when there is sea in it. As long as England persists in what an indignant French gentleman called "une "politique de Snobs," by which he meant her refusal to allow Sir E. WATKIN to endanger the country by his Tunnel, it will always be a chief object with travellers to have as little boat as possible. The Newhaven and Southampton lines have their merits, and will not want for customers; but their object is not speed. They will be used by people who wish to save their money, and who from the nature of things in this wicked world must needs put up with something less than the best.

Those (from the business point of view) more respectable travellers to whom money is not so much a consideration as comfort have, however, their own grievances, which a correspondent of the Times has been stating at length. In point of speed they are not so well served as they might be. To argue from what they are to get from the club train when it does begin to run next November, we can only conclude that the express trains between London and Paris have not run as fast as they might have done. An improvement will be made after the 1st of July, owing to the opening of a loop-line outside of Boulogne, which shortens the Calais route by a quarter of an hour. The convenience might have been provided before, and has probably been withheld through some Railway Company quarrel. In France, too, they have never shown much zeal in trying to obtain speed in their best days, and in the opinion of most travellers their whole railway administration has fallen off in efficiency since the days of the Empire. There is neither the same desire for speed on the part of the public nor the same competition between the Companies. It would be idle to expect from French Companies anything so spirited as the promised establishment of cross-country expresses by the Great Western and London and North-Western. When those are in working order, it may really in some parts of England cease to be the case that two sides of a triangle can be shorter than the third, which has hitherto been the case, maugre the beard of EUCLID. At this moment, if a man wishes to go from one country town to another, it is frequently the best course to come up to London by one express and go down by another. Attention to speed and convenience is not to be much hoped for from French, or, indeed, from any Continental, lines. What is to be expected where passengers are penned up like sheep and then hounded on to the platform in a crowd? A better proof of the inferiority of foreigners could not be found than the fact that it is more convenient to go from London to Paris than from Paris to London. When you are started by an English Company some time is allowed you to eat on the road. When you are started by a French Company, you get either very little or none at all. In some trains you are reduced to the necessity of eating on board the boat. No doubt there has been a great improvement in Channel boats of late years, and the passenger is no longer necessarily doomed to dive into a dingy low cabin, full of bad smells, stuffy and dirty, there to feed as he best may on dubious beef off insufficiently washed plates. Still, there are people who cannot eat in any cabin, however well fitted, while the deck is heaving under them and everything is rolling from side to side. For them decent intervals to eat in should be provided on the road—otherwise they must act on DALGETTY'S principle, and provision the fortress for several days before leaving Paris at untimely hours, to the peril of their digestions. Of waste of time in looking at tickets, and so forth, at Calais, we shall not say much; for does not the traveller from Scotland begin to wonder how many more times his ticket is to be looked at before he reaches York? Then, when the traveller from Paris reaches a civilized country, there is still waste of time over parcel-vans, and by Folkestone there are overcharges on luggage. But here the South-Eastern comes in, and where the South-Eastern comes in words fail. These nuisances ought to be amended, and particularly the provend nuisance. Nowadays there is no excuse for the expensive quick train which does not carry a dining-car, and one which supplies good food, too. Perhaps, as the travelling season is coming on, if tourists were to band stoutly and make a great disturbance, they might cow, not only the North of France, but even the South-Eastern. It is their only chance of being better treated, for the Directors will pay little heed to mere individual grumbling.

LITERARY AND ARTISTIC SWEATING.

IN all trades somebody makes a profit out of somebody's labour; the question is whether he leaves the labourer nothing but starvation wages. To reach that level is the essence of "sweating," and it appears that the level has been reached in art. The Globe publishes the following "exact copy of "an order issued by a Jewish firm to an artist to supply "them with oil paintings, 12 in. by 8 in. at 4*d*. each, the "artist to find, of course, his own boards and oils, and pay-"ment to be made once a month":—

Order No.——

To Mr.—— From ——

London, June 22, 1888.

We hand you this order subject to following terms and conditions, which, if accepted, please acknowledge by returning attached slip duly signed.

Terms 5 per cent. dis.
To be well packed in.
To be executed within 14 days.
To be delivered free at above address.
N.B. The number of this order to be marked on the invoice.

Cheques for current accounts are posted on the third Tuesday in each month provided a statement is received by the previous Friday.

12 dozen Oils on boards, 12 by 8.—4*s*..........£2 8*s*. 0*d*.
Assorted, two-thirds Landscapes, one-third Marines, as per samples.
Specimens of the Marines to be submitted.

To Messrs.—— Order No.——

Your order as per above number duly received and accepted under terms and conditions stated thereon.

Dated—— Signed——

Thus in a fortnight the artist is to supply one hundred and forty-four paintings in oil, at 4*s*. per dozen, minus discount. If he works on Sundays, this makes a trifle over twenty pictures daily. The artist, when expenses are deducted, will be paid about a pound a week at this trade. Of course the question arises, Who are the Jewish patrons; who purchase the landscapes and "marines" from them, how much do they pay, and where on earth is the artist? Might he not do better by illustrating the pavements of the streets? Would he be so badly paid if he designed "posters"? Any artist who can give the world his own account of the whole transaction will make more by his "copy" than by many gross of "marines." Even OUIDA's favourite neglected genius must have been better paid for decorating the lids of chocolate boxes. Probably the artists of the Christmas cards could tell some odd tales of sweating. That agreeable and humane method always exists where labour is cheap. Now it is probable that no labour is so cheap as that of lady amateurs and intelligent clergymen. They like to see themselves in print, and will work for nothing sometimes. Their pursuit of l'art pour l'art is hard on the professional. For such reasons the making of translations is an art about as profitable as match-making, and about as feebly exercised as any art in the world. What is a man or woman paid for translating a French novel? and how can good rendering have a chance when bad versions are so economical? Or how can we expect the public which reads translated French to care for the quality of the labour? How should such a public know what is good and what is bad? The translation of the classics has escaped from the sweaters because a few of the many who use "cribs" do know what is good and bad. But does no sweating prevail in literature? Who writes the little pretty pious books of verse, with pretty processed prints of chubby, yet moribund, flower-sellers, angels, lilies, and the other fauna and flora of sentiment? What proportion do the gains of the labourer bear to those of the—well, of the capitalist? How are the authors of penny novels remunerated? One of them, in an interesting essay, has expressed his content; but he seems to be at the very top of the tree. Are tame authors actually kept in hutches anywhere, selling themselves for about 200*l*. a year? Or is this the wild invention of a fancy which might easily be a little fatigued? Nobody will hold an inquisition into literary and artistic sweating; but the sweatees, so to speak, would perhaps make more by telling their tale than by abiding in their hutches.

BUSINESS AND PLEASURE ON THE RAILWAY.

A LEARNED judge once ironically rebuked counsel for talking of the "moral obligations recognized by railway Companies." He evidently regarded the phrase as carrying with it a savour as of transcendental metaphysics, and as belonging to a vocabulary which stands in no relation to any real existences whatever. This may, perhaps, have been going a little too far. It is not in the nature of things impossible that railway Companies should recognize moral as distinct from legal obligations; but it is, on the whole, safe to "neglect" the former class of obligations as too indeterminate to affect any calculations with respect to a railway Company's action in any given case. We shall put the case perhaps with substantial accuracy if we say that railway Companies feel morally bound (1) to discharge these duties to the public which they cannot evade without risk of legal consequences, and (2) to select for performance those specific duties which they owe for the time being to that particular class of the public who are contributing most to their traffic returns. The latter view of their obligations is quite understood, and to a great extent acquiesced in, by the long-suffering body of railway travellers; and they are even willing, it would appear, to allow the Companies to act upon principle (2) with such thoroughness as to expose principle (1) to considerable danger of infraction.

In the case of one railway Company we are strongly of opinion that such an infraction of principle is actually and constantly being committed. The London and South-Western Railway is, as all those who use it are aware, a line of which the proprietors enjoy exceptional and exceptionally frequent opportunities of attesting their sense of moral obligation towards that class of the public by whom they are for the moment turning in most money. It is along this favoured line that the intending spectators of the Oxford and Cambridge boat-race flock annually forth to Putney, Barnes, and Mortlake. As one of the feeders of Epsom Downs it does a brisk business in professional and amateur race-attenders during the Derby week. It has more than half the monopoly of railway conveyance to Ascot; and, as few people go to Ascot by road, it may be said to have the carriage of most Londoners who go out to that fashionable and generally enjoyable meeting. The augmentation of its traffic and the confusion of its London terminus are, consequently, on all the days of this meeting enormous, and on the Cup day simply indescribable. But, in addition to this, the South-Western Railway is singularly blest in providing access to quite a number of minor racecourses in the neighbourhood of London. It carries not only its crowds of popular holiday-makers to Hampton the happy, but also its train-loads of "serious" racing men—to quote Lord MARCUS BERESFORD's "excellent difference"—to Sandown and Kempton Park. The London and South-Western Railway Company is, in fact, continually finding itself indebted to a special and temporary class of passengers, and the consciences of the Directors are no doubt heavily burdened with a sense of moral obligation towards them. Regular passengers, season-ticket-holders, the people whose business takes them backwards and forwards daily on the line, and the requirements of whose business do not, strange to say, suspend themselves in deference to aquatic or equestrian contests—this class of the Company's customers go, and have long gone, to the wall. With much regret, no doubt, the Company subject these unfortunate persons on every occasion of these almost perpetually recurring fixtures to intolerable discomfort and inconvenience, and, in not a few instances, to positive pecuniary loss. The Directors obviously feel under a moral obligation to their holiday-making customers to do this. "It is their duty, and they do," as sings one of the heroes of the Bab Ballads; and to all expostulation they think it sufficient to reply that people who use their line daily for business purposes have "had notice" that its use at the proper hours is practically forbidden to them, and—that is enough. The question, however—a question which the victims are beginning to ask with increasing curiosity—is whether this is enough, in the contemplation of law, and whether it is within the legal competence of a railway Company, not merely to deny their regular customers "reasonable facilities," but for half the day, on four or five days of five or six weeks of every year, to deny them all facilities whatsoever for proceeding about their lawful business. We are personally of opinion that this is not within the legal competence of a railway Company, and we strongly recommend railway passengers to "organize" for the purpose of trying the question.

CRICKET.

PERPETUAL rain damps the spirit of prophecy in cricket. Were it not so, we might attempt to vaticinate about the University match; but, with grounds so uncertain, some "bold seer in a trance" might hesitate to forecast events. Certainly we cannot but hold that there is no cause for laying odds on Cambridge. They are innocent odds, and harmless amounts change hands, but still they express the condition of opinion or belief. Neither University has covered itself, in town, with anything but mud and sawdust. At Lord's, Cambridge (playing twelve men) had to meet a very mild eleven of M.C.C. Mr. WALKER, Mr. WEBBE, Mr. W. G. GRACE were not playing. CARLIN, POUGHER, PHILLIPS, and MARTIN were not a strong batting tail. The wicket was good enough on Monday, and the damp heat was not invigorating to bowlers. Yet Cambridge had some difficulty in making 205. Mr. Wood hit freely, Mr. Kemp's was a sterling innings; the rest did not appear to exhibit much spirit. On the other side, M.C.C. played in the tamest way, and it was a kind of holiday for the Cambridge bowlers. Experiments in changing them were tried, and if Mr. Ford had bowled more, probably M.C.C. would have made a still smaller score. Chatterton's 40 was almost the only innings worth mention. Mr. Woods is no doubt a very dangerous bowler, high and swift, but he scarcely satisfied a critical taste. Whatever he may be next week, he was erratic at Lord's. Still he is a fast bowler, and his very irregularity may probably puzzle men who, like Mr. Gresson and Mr. Simpson, played Lohmann, Beaumont, Bowley, Abel, and others for hours at the Oval. Mr. Woods may repeat the deeds and rival the repute of Mr. Powys and Mr. Cobden, or he may be a failure. This is one of the glorious uncertainties of the game. Given a wet wicket, caking under a fierce sun, and the chances that Oxford will score off Mr. Woods are very slim indeed. Mr. Ford, however, is the more elegant and trustworthy bowler of the two. He is a classical, Mr. Woods is a romantic, bowler. How weak the Cambridge attack may sometimes be was discovered in the second innings, when M.C.C. scored 315 for seven wickets. Chatterton, Mr. Hirst, and Mr. Powell—a new name at Lord's—were the heroes of the occasion. Mr. Woods was reduced to bowling lobs. Some catches were missed; and Mr. McGregor, at the wicket, hardly came up to his great reputation. Perhaps Cambridge began by despising their antagonists and allowing them to get their eyes in to the bowling of Mr. Mordaunt, in place of starting with Mr. Ford. On the whole, if Cambridge wins, it will not say much for Oxford.

That ancient University threw away an easy chance of beating Lancashire. Suppose the ground was ever so difficult, resolute swiping should have knocked off the necessary threescore of runs. There is no use in playing a careful pokey game to difficult bowling on a thoroughly untrustworthy wicket. In the old days Oxford men should have run out to Mr. Steel at any hazard. In the Badminton Cricket Book he admits that he hates being treated in this way. You cannot well score under forty, for a whole side, if you do go in for hitting on a bad wicket, and you rarely score more by a feeble policy of poking and blocking. De l'audace should be the motto.

Oxford has, apparently, no fast bowler, no Butler, Kenny, or Fellowes. At the Oval they found out the greatness of this defect. On a good wicket Surrey made 650, and Mr. W. W. Read got 338. He might have stayed in till now, probably, if he had cared. The Oxford team has plenty of bowling, all much of a mediocre muchness. Mr. Nepean did not play; if he can make Cambridge nervous, he may be very useful. But he has not made many people nervous this year. Mr. Croome had 120 runs made off him for no wicket. The best analyses, except Mr. Gresson's, gave an average of 40 runs a wicket. The fielding was not very worthy of a University eleven. Some catches were missed in remote parts of the country. Only one man—Abel—was clean bowled, and he had made within three of his century. This all looks very bad; but Cambridge does not include Mr. Key, the Reads (these "glittering Dioscuri," as the critic said), nor Abel, nor Lohmann, in its eleven. Cambridge batting is not so strong as that, while the 315 of M.C.C. against Cambridge may be set off against the score of Surrey. Nor should it be forgotten that, on a pitch that had suffered much, Surrey did not lower one Oxford wicket. Mr. Gresson's bat was uncommonly straight, and Mr. Simpson showed freedom in company with defence. Their united score was 47. The whole of the Oxford eleven can bat; indeed, their wealth of batting is almost embarrassing; nor is it easy to see who should go out of the eleven to admit Mr. Nepean. On the whole, the University match is likely to be decided by weather and nerve more than by abstract excellence. Much will depend on the captain, and either side may have cause to sigh for "one hour of" Mr. Kemp or Mr. Steel.

The county cricket of the week has been chiefly remarkable for Kent's unexpected victory over Notts at Nottingham—a sad sight for Notts' eyes—and for Mr. Bonnor's and Wainwright's batting in Yorkshire v. Australia. Lee and Mr. Hirst also distinguished themselves; but the Australians were giving Mr. Ferris a rest, as the match could not be finished.

THE EDUCATION COMMISSION REPORT.

It would only be the merest politeness to describe the final Report of the Education Commission as weighty. Less could not be said for a Blue-book produced by so many distinguished persons after two years of examination and cogitation. But in this case the word would not be a figure of speech. The extracts and headings of chapters published in the Times show that when the Blue-book is accessible it will not only be large, but full of matter, some of it of a distinctly contentious nature. For various reasons it is well to be sober in comment on it as yet. It is never safe to criticize anything merely on extracts and the headings of chapters. Then, too, the contentious matter will be much debated. A minority Report is threatened in a few days, and between the partisans of the two there will be abundant battle. Already it is understood that the minority "will object to the Commission being made responsible for the accuracy of the facts, "and for the conclusions arrived at in the historical portions of the Report, and will criticize and dissent from" certain of its conclusions. As the matter in dispute is one which is excellently adapted to excite the angry feelings of many, and touch the interests of not a few, it is quite unnecessary to be in a hurry to express an opinion lest the opportunity should be lost. The eye of the Able Editor, looking onward to the silly season, may rejoice to see a long perspective of pegs on which articles may hang when Parliament has ceased for a space to fulfil its useful journalistic functions.

Even from brief and jerky notes of contents it is possible to guess what the battle will be about, and also to see how much of the Report will be accepted with little opposition. In this latter portion we are glad to perceive a condemnation of the system of payment by results with its hard pedantic rules. Perhaps if the common sense of an inspector is allowed more freedom, less may be heard than at present of cases of Board School children who, after passing the Fifth Standard, are found unable either to read or write. There will be opposition to the Commission's decision in favour of religious teaching in schools, but it will be the opposition of acrid partisans. Another thing may be learnt from the summary of the Report, not perhaps with pleasure, but certainly without surprise. It is that the Commissioners have to recommend further calls on the ratepayers. Much that they desire to see done may be good from more than one point of view, but it will certainly cost money. It will be a humane thing, no doubt, to supply ample recreation grounds, but it will be a costly thing to do. This, however, is by no means that one of their recommendations which is most threatening to the pockets of the ratepayers. Neither are we very much afraid of their suggestion that the grants should be somewhat increased, or that teachers should be better paid and better pensioned. No community ever outran the constable yet by lavish treatment of hard-worked servants. The extravagance threatened by the Commission is of quite another kind. Whatever may be the case with the minority, the majority seems to have been persuaded that it is not only the duty of the State to supply such elementary education as will save the poorer part of the population from blank ignorance, but to give them the secondary education which is a luxury. We hear of better schools to be provided for promising pupils, of bursaries for clever scholars, of courses of training in local Universities, and even of exhibitions to enable the cream of the candidates to go to Oxford or Cambridge. To this last recommendation we see one objection which does not seem to have struck the Commissioners. If these last prizes are only won after proper tests, and by lads of exceptional brains and energy—which, we presume, is meant to be the case—it does not seem likely that the successful candidates who have once fought their way to a real University will be prepared to return to the heavy and unthankful work of Board School teaching. There will be wondrous little human nature in them if they do not think they can do better for themselves. The State would not improbably discover that, instead of improving the level of its Board School teaching, it had spent its money to recruit the teaching staff of the Universities, to increase the number of the members of the junior Bar who are fighting madly for briefs, or even to add to the applicants for employment on the London press—which would be an abominable use of the taxpayers' purse. Altogether, the Commissioners seem to have leaned very much too much towards the belief that it is a national duty to swell the already considerable number of educated persons who have nothing to do with their education. It may be reactionary and obscurantist to hold that this is wrong; but, if the view has any justification, then the Report of the Commissioners must be condemned. They have the fads of the day on their side, however. Of what is likely to be the least popular of their suggestions—that voluntary schools should be aided by the State—there will be plenty to say when the minority Report appears. For the present it is enough to observe that a State-aided voluntary school has a little the air of a contradiction in terms, and that here again we have a demand for money to be paid out of the rates.

BARRISTERS AND SOLICITORS.

A DAY when one of the Law Officers of the Crown is in favour of fusing the two branches of the profession, while the other is strongly opposed to it, is likely to be a day, if not of rebuke and blasphemy, at any rate of searchings of heart for members of the Bar. Nor is it otherwise than a natural incident of the changeful time that one or other of these two high authorities should be appealed to as a ductor dubitantium by seekers after truth in their own department of the lawyer's art and mystery. A plaintive appeal of the sort has just reached the ATTORNEY-GENERAL from Mr. ROBERT YERBURGH, M.P., accompanied with the notification that Sir RICHARD WEBSTER's correspondent proposes to publish his letter and the reply to it "for the benefit of the profession." "May a barrister," asks Mr. YERBURGH, "advise and otherwise act for the outside "client, and receive a fee direct without the intervention "of a solicitor? To what extent, if at all, is this right "limited after a writ has been issued?" Mr. YERBURGH's second question is an even more delicate one. "Is there," he inquires, "any minimum limit to the fee which a "counsel may charge on non-contentious cases?"

About the maximum limit Mr. YERBURGH is naturally not curious—that limit being indeed determined only by the conditions set forth in an anecdote much too old to be quoted here. The ATTORNEY-GENERAL naturally treated it as within his correspondent's knowledge, and confined himself to the other two questions. His answers are discretion itself. He is of opinion, for reasons stated by him, and which appear to us, at any rate, to be sufficient, that, with reference to contentious business, a barrister should not act or advise without the intervention of a solicitor either before or after litigation is commenced. As regards non-contentious business, Sir RICHARD WEBSTER holds that, "speaking generally, there is no objection to a barrister "seeing and advising a lay client without the intervention "of a solicitor upon points relating to the lay client's own "personal conduct or guidance or the management or dis-"position of his own affairs or transactions." And, finally, "as regards the fee in cases in which counsel are "willing to advise a lay client," under the circumstances referred to, "I know," says Sir RICHARD, solemnly, "of no "rule beyond this—that no junior should accept a fee of "less than 1*l.* 3*s.* 6*d.*, and no leader of less than 2*l.* 4*s.* 6*d.*" This is, in fact, the "law of the minimum" after which Mr. YERBURGH was inquiring; and there could, therefore, be no rule beyond it—as that rule would itself become the regulation which is the object of Mr. YERBURGH's curiosity.

This curious little correspondence appears, as we have said, to point to a considerable unsettlement of the professional mind. As to non-contentious business, it has always, so far as we are aware, been understood that some of the most important business of this class—the preparation, that is to say, of wills and marriage settlements—might be undertaken by counsel for lay clients without the intervention of a solicitor, the rule being founded on a very sensible respect for such a client's possible wishes in the matter of privacy. And it would, no doubt, be a thoroughly logical and legitimate extension of the rule to apply it generally to points relating to "the lay client's own personal "conduct or guidance or the management or disposition of "his own affairs or transactions." The question of fees usually settles itself amicably between two persons so intimate as barrister and lay client may be assumed to be in the case supposed. But as to contentious business, this rule has hitherto been so clear and well known that these inquiries on the part of Mr. YERBURGH appear to indicate something in the nature of a revolt against it among certain members of the legal profession. Can it be that some enterprising spirits are anticipating "fusion," and acting as though the distinction between barrister and solicitor had ceased to exist? Even Sir EDWARD CLARKE, we imagine, would hardly approve of such precipitancy as that.

THUNDER AND LIGHTNING.

ANYBODY in doubt as to the blessings of a scientific age ought to be reassured by a recent article on thunderstorms in the Evening Standard, which proves that cheap science is not less marvellous than cheap literature. Here's instruction for all who fear the lightning flash and "the all-dreaded thunder-stone," and much of it is happily enforced by venerable saws and miraculous illustrations. There is, indeed, nothing absent from the article that could be reasonably expected, save the fine old legend of BENJAMIN FRANKLIN and the kite. PROMETHEUS might, perhaps, have served the writer if he had been a less serious servant of science and the people. It is satisfactory to learn that the action of the electric current is well known. Sometimes it makes a body "a shapeless mass," or it may leave the smitten person without a trace of external injury. "Some individuals have been struck again and again," while others "close by" have been passed over. Perhaps they were made of "glass or resin," or were so happily constituted as to be lightning-proof. It is a fact—"there can-"not be a doubt on the subject"—that some people are more apt to be struck than others. Possibly these are the wicked, who flourish for a season like the bay; and the bay-tree, when he doth wax tall—so travellers say—is very liable to suffer by lightning. Every reader of Mr. BLACKMORE's delightful romance Christowell will remember the red-faced man and his haunting fear of lightning. He was wicked enough for any villany, and he did not escape. But our scientist does not tell us how to distinguish the susceptible, nor does he say they must be of a sanguine complexion. It is disheartening, also, to learn that, though we know all about "the manner" in which the electric current acts, there is a sad lack of information respecting the "modes" by which the lightning bolts "play their part in causing death." Women, it is solemnly recorded, are less liable to be struck than men—in spite of the notorious fact that women have "usually more "steel about them"—the exquisite reason being that they are more often exposed, like "buildings" and "ships." This, at least, is the writer's conclusion, derived, as he mysteriously hints, from the "experience of France." Labourers in fields are very apt to suffer from lightning, like the rustic lovers of Stanton Harcourt immortalized by POPE's epigram; but we do not know that Frenchwomen, who work much in the fields, require more metal about them than men. This interesting yet obscure question is scarcely cleared of all its mystery by the Evening Standard writer.

On the whole, there is more profit in his injunctions than in his speculations. It is excellent to be warned against standing under a tree in a thunderstorm, especially when the base of the tree is moist; for in this condition the tree is "apt to act as a conductor." You may stand at a window, however, with little danger, it seems, though it depends, we should say, upon the value you set upon your sight. A very stirring volume might be compiled of the extraordinary effects of lightning; though nothing in the Annual Register or Gentleman's Magazine can vie with an example cited in the Evening Standard. Ten years ago, it is said, there was a man who was entirely divested of his clothes by a flash of lightning, and yet was not seriously injured. "But there are other cases," the writer goes on to say, "in which the contrary has happened." Could anything match this for horror?—the man gone and the clothes scarce singed? Unfortunately, the writer proceeds to explain that the poor man was only "stripped, though at the "same time deprived of life." After this, there is little excitement to be derived from his remarks on the substitution of "artificial lightning," or the electric fluid, for the ordinary methods of executing criminals; and his well-meant suggestion that science, in the interests of malefactors, may yet "outwit" the law, leaves us unblanched. We can comfortably leave the law to fight it out with science.

THE MOTION OF CENSURE.

IN the speech with which he introduced his motion of censure Mr. MORLEY took occasion to dismiss the criticisms of which the manœuvre he was conducting had been made the object with a few words of lofty contempt. Those, he said, who had told him that the motion was a mistake in tactics were "persons who seem to think that "politics are mainly made up of tactics." It is to be hoped, for Mr. MORLEY's sake, that this view of the composition of politics is not an accurate one; for assuredly if it is, he has done his party an ill turn in challenging the Irish administration of the Government—at any rate, at this precise juncture and in this particular way. If the critics thus disdainfully referred to should only happen to be right, it would be difficult to measure the change which "politics" must have undergone between Monday afternoon and the small hours of Wednesday morning. We are not, however, concerned to give an unqualified support to the proposition that "politics are mainly made up of tactics," and we are further willing to concede a proposition with which Mr. Morley might, if it had occurred to him, have turned the flank of his critics—the proposition that it is not necessarily bad tactics to challenge a Parliamentary contest in which you are certain to get handsomely beaten. We are quite content with the humbler contention that to invite a defeat of this kind cannot be a tactical end in itself, and that upon those who issue the invitation rests the burden of showing what positive advantage was to be expected from it. In the present instance that burden is an exceptionally heavy one, for the reason that the defeat which was invited has proved to be one of an unexpectedly, and indeed unprecedentedly, disastrous kind. This is, in part of course, only Mr. Morley's bad luck; but not wholly so, because it is impossible not to suppose that the Gladstonians counted on detaching at least some Liberal-Unionists from the Ministerial majority, and were, to the extent to which that delusion influenced their tactics, the authors of their own discomfiture. To that extent, at any rate, they have to thank themselves for having procured a ratification of the Ministerial policy in Ireland by the absolutely largest majority which the Government have obtained on any question since their accession to office; or, to put it another way—by a majority which is within very few votes of the largest majority it is possible for them to obtain; or, to put it a third, and perhaps the most satisfactory way of all, with no single defection, not caused by unavoidable absence, from their ranks, save and except that of Sir Edward Watkin.

Without attaching a superstitious value to tactics, we must say that this is not a result which carries on its face a justification of the manœuvre which brought it about; and that, if such justification is to be found at all, it must be sought elsewhere than in the division list. The next most natural place in which to look for it is, of course, the debate itself. It is, no doubt, a plausible contention enough that it is worth the while of an Opposition even to show that the Ministerial majority is more compact and consentient than ever, if they can at the same time show that the Ministerial arguments do not hang together as well as they did. A flaw in the moral armour of a Government is worth exposing, it may be said, even at the cost of showing that their material defences are still impregnable. If the supporters of a motion of censure can get the better of Ministers in debate, they may disregard its results, and trust to the country to see in time that political right is not on the side of Parliamentary might, and to redress the balance at the next election. But are Mr. Morley and his friends entitled to this consolation under their defeat? We doubt whether there is to-day a single unprejudiced man in England who would say so; and we know as a fact that there are many men not pretending to be unprejudiced—followers, to wit, of Mr. Gladstone—who are ruefully admitting the contrary. All Parliamentary debates must, of course, be judged reasonably, and miracles must not be expected from them on either side. No one supposes, for instance, that Mr. Morley could by the utmost vigour in attack have succeeded in converting, say, a branch of the Primrose League, or that Mr. Balfour could by the greatest skill in rejoinder induce a Gladstonian Caucus to abjure the Separatist cause. But, unless not only the whole theory of our political system is mistaken, but the practical explanation of the instability of our electorate is a too humiliating one, there must be now and always a large, and even a determining, proportion of English electors who pass their time between election and election in an almost normal state of suspended judgment between parties and policies, and whose ultimate decision is actually governed by preferences which debates like that just concluded are mainly instrumental in building up. At any rate, it does not lie in the mouths of Mr. Morley and his school either to deny the existence of this supreme electoral tribunal, or to question their capacity for making up their minds on rational grounds, that is to say, in obedience to the weight of the evidence. The contention that they have made up their minds already is all very well for the use of the stump-orator or the electioneering letter-writer; but, if the advocate who employs this common forensic artifice in addressing a jury really believed what he says, he would at once sit down, and the Opposition would certainly spare themselves the trouble of Parliamentary conflict if they were as confident as they pretend to be in the completed conversion of the hostile majority of 1886. Their whole Parliamentary action is, of course, a simple stultification of such pretences. It presupposes that there is a considerable proportion of the electorate who have given a provisional assent to the executive policy of the Government in Ireland, but who are open to being persuaded to revoke that approval on sufficient cause shown.

It is to this class that the debate of this week—that, indeed, every debate in Parliament on the policy of Ministers—is, in fact, addressed; and we doubt whether, on the whole, so ill-timed, ill-prepared, and thoroughly ineffective an appeal has ever in like case been formulated. From the weak opening of the debate down to its inappropriate close in one of those long-winded speeches of Mr. Sexton's, by the length of which on this occasion he precluded two leading Parliamentary speakers from addressing the House, the inequality of the contest between the two parties to the controversy was more conspicuously displayed than it has been since that controversy. Mr. Morley's own speech was a fresh example of that fatality which seems dooming him to miss what we suppose he regards as his Parliamentary destiny. In proportion as his manner as an orator improves his matter gets worse, and last Monday night he delivered at once the most rhetorically effective and the most argumentatively feeble of all the speeches with which he has favoured the House of Commons. Mr. Gladstone, again, except that in one or two assertions he beat his own record of audacity, is admitted, even by his sole admirer in the respectable press in London, to have been below his true form. The speeches of men like Mr. Shaw Lefevre on the one hand and of Mr. O'Brien on the other are, of course, the mere dregs and froth of a debate of this kind, and Mr. Sexton's contribution to it was mainly remarkable, as we have said, for its having shut out Sir William Harcourt and Lord Hartington from the debate. Against the two Parnellite orators we may confidently match their two Unionist countrymen, Colonel Saunderson and Mr. Russell. On the other hand, the Chancellor of the Exchequer was, if not at his very best, yet in good trim; while Mr. Balfour's speech, delivered under the utmost difficulties, and amid more than the usual amount of unmannerly interruption, is admitted even by his enemies to have been the most powerful in a now somewhat long series of steadily improving Parliamentary efforts. Having said thus much, however, in recognition of the superior force and brilliancy with which the Unionist debaters did their work, we are prepared to add without hesitation that the two sets of advocates might have changed briefs without in the least degree affecting the argumentative result. Mr. Balfour and Mr. Goschen could no more have succeeded with the Opposition case than Mr. Gladstone and Mr. Morley could have failed with that of the Government. It seems incredible that any one with the slightest pretension to the title of an experienced Parliamentary hand should have seen any materials for a formidable attack on the Government on the paltry array of grievances which alone the Opposition leaders were able to marshal—now complaining that a Resident Magistrate has passed an excessive sentence; now that an Irish Court has misjudged evidence, as English juries do, and are set right for doing, every day; and now that a truculent and not too truthful agitator whom the Opposition leaders choose to regard, and pretend to think is regarded by the English people, as a hero, because he is cheered by the same sort of Irishmen who huzzaed for the murderers of Fitzmaurice, is treated as though, in Mr. Gladstone's language, so appropriate on the lips of "the "people's" statesman, he wore "a coat of frieze instead of "a coat of cloth." We can only account for such an aberration by supposing that their "political meteorology" has addled their wits, or that they are suffering from an attack of "Ayr on the brain."

THE SUNDAY CLOSING CLAUSE.

Mr. Ritchie's exposition of the reasons which have induced the Government to withdraw the licensing clauses of the Local Government Bill was in itself amply sufficient to justify the step; but, if it had not been, the debate which followed it would have placed the matter beyond doubt. The temperance party may usually be trusted to make a display of their narrow and impracticable temper on a question of this kind, and on Thursday night they conspicuously, to use an expressive Americanism, "gave "themselves away." It is, no doubt, not quite fair to include Sir WILLIAM HARCOURT among their number, or to charge teetotal fanaticism with the whole of a responsibility which rests in great measure, of course, on factious partisanship. Nevertheless, the two forces in question are, and always have been, natural allies, and the Government might have reckoned on their combination on this or any other question bearing on the traffic in alcoholic liquors. They know their HARCOURT, or they ought to know him by this time, and it should not at all have surprised them to find him endeavouring to press all those small sectarian animosities with which Parliaments in these days increasingly abound into the service of an Opposition which has so signally failed to shake or discredit the Government on any of the larger questions of policy. They ought not even to have been surprised at his apparent expectation of success; for the fact is that, but for the sensible action of Mr. CAINE and the Liberal-Unionists, the intrigue of the member for Derby might very well have been successful. His manifest irritation against the member for Barrow and those members of the temperance party who have acted with him affords, in fact, the best proof of the high hopes which Sir WILLIAM must have entertained and the severe disappointment which he has suffered in respect of them. Under other circumstances he would have found ample histrionic enjoyment in the broad comedy of posing as an apostle of temperance, and calling upon men who have grown grey in that cause to follow him in "giving a good "temperance vote." But his raillery of Mr. CAINE was too spiteful to allow us to suppose that he took any pleasure in a theatrical performance which no longer carried with it any prospect of political profit.

The whole tone of the debate, in short—with its striking revelation of the jealousies which divide the various sects of social reformers—was eloquent of the wisdom of Ministers in cutting away the licensing clauses of the Bill. On general grounds of policy, apart from particular Parliamentary exigencies, we are not ourselves in the least disposed to regret their loss. The "Local Option" people must be supposed to know their own business; and, if they are satisfied to let slip such an unexampled chance of obtaining the legislative recognition of their pet principle, it is not for us to criticize their course of action. We are quite content with the now certain postponement for another year or two, and in all probability till another Parliament, of that most questionable legislative experiment. Meanwhile, the debate of last Thursday shows clearly enough that any prominent Liberal or Conservative Government which may hereafter deem it necessary to take up the question of the liquor traffic—and, for our own part, we think that future Governments would do well to let the question severely alone, as one which is likely to settle itself much more satisfactorily than legislation is likely to settle it—must not handicap themselves by taking it up as a branch of any other question whatsoever. It will have to be dealt with uncomplicated by any collateral issues, and, if possible, in such conciseness of detail as will leave the legislating Government plenty of time and room to fight that battle of principle which will unquestionably have to be fought, unless we are to hand over the liberties of the people to a set of fanatical busybodies, and the right of property to a gang of piratical philanthropists.

THE CALENDAR OF THE PAVEMENT.

THE Pavement of the back street has been, so long as the memory of the oldest inhabitant carryeth him, the Playground of the children. So short, however, is the span of life, that what seems at first to be a respectable antiquity is but a thing of a paltry hundred years or so. For before that time, so small were the paving-stones, so uneven was the surface, so frequent was the dandy trap, so obstructive were the posts, so inconvenient the bulkheads, that none of those games which require a large and plane surface with some scope for the action of arms and legs could be so much as attempted. The children's Playground, down to the middle of the Third George, was that natural place of recreation afforded by the open fields lying all round London and then within easy reach. Still, though the Pavement playground—call it not, coarsely, the Gutter Playground—is a young thing, it has been with us all our lives, and it is not without a pang that we see it displaced by the new park, brilliant with rhododendrons, by the Board School asphalted campus, and by the disused Burial Ground, where one or two tombs are left to mark the former sacredness of the spot, as the tobacconist in days gone by kept up one shutter on the Sunday to show his respect for religion. It is, one is compelled to acknowledge, better for the children to play in these places than on the Pavement; there is more room for them; they can assemble in larger numbers and they can acquire habits of law and order. There are, again, no carts to rumble along and break up a game; there are no foot-passengers to tramp through the players and scatter them; there are no parents to cuff the callow brood. Yet the change brings losses.

Before the Pavement wholly ceases to be a Playground, before the children all fall under the drill and rule of the gymnasium, let us snatch from oblivion the Calendar of Sports, such as are still played in a degenerate age. We must not look for the games of the kerb, the pavement, and the doorstep in aristocratic quarters. No children play in Bond Street and her daughters; you might as well look for a game of Golf as of Hopscotch in Piccadilly. Nor, again, must you look for children playing on the Pavement of Dalston the Genteel, in the nobler quarters of Camden Town, Ball's Pond, or any of those districts where Clerkery loveth to resort. It is said that the children of Clerkery do never play, except at counting-houses, and that they occupy their leisure wholly in the acquisition of that fine handwriting which will equip them for the career which begins at five shillings a week and ends with two hundred pounds a year.

The games still in vogue may be resolved into two classes; the first of them, which has been called the Hardy Perennial, contains those which are followed all the year round without respect to season, subject only to the condition that it does not rain. The skipping-rope naturally suggests itself as the most generally practised; it is true that the season of the skipping-rope is longer than that of any other game, but it is not a winter sport; it begins, as a rule, though girls are an uncertain and skittish race as regards law, with the first Bank Holiday, and continues till late in the autumn. The only sport of which it may be said that it is followed quite through the year by the children, is that of dancing to the music of the barrel-organ. No one has ever found out who pays the musician—certainly there is never a copper among the whole of his audience; it is supposed that he plays out of sheer kindness, and from love of art, and that when he has tired the children, he goes away and extorts black mail out of maddened poets and mathematicians by grinding under their windows. The Pavement is, in fact, the nursery of the ballet; not one of these girls but will presently look upon an appearance upon the boards as the most desirable thing that can be granted to a young woman. When they grow up, indeed, they will find no other opportunities for dancing.

Another game which lasts through the whole year is gambling. You may see a little group of boys with buttons or with halfpence eagerly playing together. The rules of the game are unknown; but it is essential that there should be the background of a wall. Their game is some form of pitch-and-toss, and they are gambling with as much eagerness as if they were young gentlemen just come into their inheritance and recently introduced to the club and to baccarat. By this copper Crockford of the kerb they are training themselves for the fiercer joys of the silver hell, where their elder brothers sit on Saturday evenings playing away their wages at the working-men's club.

The social pleasures of the boulevard also belong to the Hardy Perennial class. They are simple. They consist chiefly in walking, each with his girl, up and down the Pavement of some crowded High. They parch their tongues, blister their cheeks, and burn their throats with the abominable "fag," which, with its acrid paper and vile tobacco, has displaced the comparatively harmless and once fashionable penny pickwick. But they are in the fashion, and they enjoy the satisfaction which belongs to social position. Besides, there is a great deal of varied excitement in the street. There is the Cheap Jack; there are the nigger minstrels—who come with the first spring day; the street spouter—a creature who has made himself too common, and is now but little regarded; the street acrobat, who has of late, after many years, again assumed the stilt; and there are many possibilities of excitement and adventure.

The second and more interesting class of Pavement sports contains those which vary with the season and their times, duly understood and regularly recurring. The Calendar of these sports has never been written down; no Parliament, Commission, or Convention has ever ordered and arranged it; yet it exists as a code accepted and understood, and it is obeyed without question. It must be understood, however, that the calendar is not fixed, like that of the ingenious Mr. Whitaker, nor is it bound by months and days, but it depends generally upon the weather. A long summer may prolong a game; a long winter may dislocate the Calendar for the whole year. The following, again, though based upon scientific observations carried on for many years, is offered with a keen sense of incompleteness—partly due to the degeneracy of the age as regards Sports and to the decadence of the Pavement, already deplored.

The year of Sports begins, not with the New Year, or with the month of January, when the street is usually too cold even for the children, but with the first mild days of February and March, when there is often a pause in the cold breath of winter and an illusive show of coming spring. Then, with one consent and as if by order, come forth the tops. One knows not by what instinct, but, just as the crocus flowers, so, simultaneously, all over the vast city, beginning with a single day, "tops is in." The peg-top begins, and is the favourite form of top. This pretty plaything allows not only the cultivation and the exhibition of a great deal of dexterity, but can also be made to enter into a form of battle; and as pegging at your adversary sometimes results in his being split open and utterly destroyed, the peg-top is naturally endeared to the boyish soul. In a fortnight or so the boys grow tired of it and substitute the whipping-top. To keep the whipping-top alive requires so much physical activity and such a prodigious amount of whipping, that the game is peculiarly marked out as adapted for days of cold east wind. Tops are followed in April or May by tipcat, which lasts sometimes till the end of June. It is a game which seems at first sight the most futile, foolish, and senseless, as well as the easiest, of all games ever yet invented. That is a wrong interpretation of the game. A thing which requires of the player the most perfect concentration of all his faculties, and a disregard almost heroic of possible—even likely—consequences (such as broken windows, maddened shopkeepers, shying horses, blinded passengers, with cuffs, kicks, and horrible flagellations) is by this circumstance alone lifted above the common. Those who have given their attention to the subject maintain that the uncertainty of hitting the cat constitutes its special charm at the outset, that the utter ignorance of whither it will fly or what mischief it will do (every cat being possessed of the Devil) also stimulates the player, and inspires him, as with a portion or measure of that diabolic possession, with an uncommon callousness and carelessness as to human suffering. They also declare that the control of the cat (it is arrived at by causing it to leap but a little way and by striking without swinging the stick) is never learned by any boy until he has grown too old to play it any longer, which is, in a way, confirmation of that possession.

The next game on the Calendar is Fly-the-garter, a summer game which should be played without hat or jacket. It is a branch of the extremely ancient game known as "giving a back." Overing the Posts, now completely forgotten because there are no longer any Posts left, was another branch. Leapfrog, also fallen into decay, is another. Fly-the-garter, however, is quite the noblest form of this game, and, as it may be made to include considerable personal suffering for the boy whose back is operated upon, it promises to continue popular. Hopscotch, another summer game, is played about the same time as Fly-the-garter. In this game the fair sex, who are debarred from giving and taking backs, are admitted on equal terms, and get their heads impartially punched when disputes arise. Bat and ball, in its various elementary forms, is hardly ever attempted on the Pavement, but is played wherever a bit of open ground, however bare of grass, affords a space distantly resembling a cricket-field. Rounders is another game which can hardly be played on the Pavement. Kiss-in-the-ring is played by the children in summer, with modern fancy varieties as taught them by ladies at their annual feasts and outings.

When the weather begins to grow colder the hoop comes in. Hardly is there any boy so poor as not to acquire possession of a hoop. The hoop is, on the whole, a solitary game; one may run races with hoops, but races on a Pavement are not favourably regarded. In the less frequented thoroughfares a clever boy may learn, however, to turn and guide his hoop so as to inflict the greatest possible amount of anxiety, with the least actual damage, to the passengers. One is tempted, perhaps, in everything to praise the past, but it is whispered by connoisseurs that the driving of the hoop is not what it was five and twenty years ago. Whistling, for instance, is a proper accompaniment to the hoop—a boy who wishes to get the full flavour out of his hoop will whistle continuously while he walks behind it. Now street whistling, beyond any doubt, has greatly declined of late years. The loud and vulgar catcall is a deplorable substitute for the vocal whistle—melodious when heard a good way off, and sometimes mellow.

With the first rains of autumn, when the dust is laid and the ground is a little damp, marbles begin. Marbles, which once boasted as many games as there are days in the year, are now fallen upon evil times. Knuckling down is clean forgotten—if the art continues it is called by another name; the alley-tor is confounded with his brother of the rank and file; there are no longer sold the finer varieties in stone and glass, or in coloured and streaky marble; nor do boys, like sportsmen, yearn for a full bag; nor do they study any longer the intricacies, the possibilities, and the subtleties by which their bag may be filled. The game is now only played by little boys—their bag is small; their game is simple; and whenever they can raise a penny the marbles become a vehicle for gambling.

When the winter really falls upon the Pavement there is little playing at all; the old-fashioned games which necessitated a great deal of running about, such as rounders, prisoner's base, tag, and the like are seldom played by the young generation; on the other hand, the children sometimes get a pair of roller skates and make a rink. Also the same vacant space which in the summer served for bat and ball will in the winter provide a ground fit for hockey, a game which still holds its own. Trap bat and ball, once a favourite game, is now extinct, at least on the London pavement. Fives, and its sisters, are unknown. There are also other losses. The antiquity of the game of knucklebones, or astragals, has not been able to preserve it. To the London children knucklebones are unknown. This is much to be deplored; first, because it is a game which can be played excellently on the doorstep so long as one's legs are short enough to use that as a table; next, because it lends itself to the keenest rivalry and cultivates a most astonishing dexterity. But it is gone. Of course a public schoolboy would scorn the knucklebone, even though it is of classical origin; and when even the Pavement knows it no longer the existence of the game is practically ended. Some time ago, a few enthusiasts talked of founding an Astragal or Knucklebone Club; but it came to nothing. Should any, however, resolve to resuscitate this game after the manner of the ancients, they may observe that, while the sheep's bones are fitter for the beginner—as larger, heavier, and lying more easily on the back of the hand—the bones of the lamb are your only true play.

Certain annual festivals which in turn enliven the Pavement do not, properly speaking, belong to the Playground, because they have ceased to be Sports. The old processions, masques, and mummings are nearly all gone, or, if they survive, they are kept up for motives wholly interested. Chimney-sweeps' day still brings out Jack-in-the-Green, but his greatness is faded. There is the Grotto to be remembered in August, the Guy of November is never forgotten, and there are the Waits of Christmas. All these are used in turn for the purpose of collecting pence, and without the least thought of observance or commemoration. Worse still, the money thus collected is generally "grabbed" by the fond parent.

Such is the Calendar of the Pavement. Alas! while we write this Calendar is rapidly being forgotten; the Playground of the Pavement is deserted, the children's games are changing. The Board Schools, which shut up the boys and girls between nine o'clock in the morning and four in the afternoon, have cut into the continuity of their play. A man may now walk during these hours through streets occupied wholly by working-men and see never a game of hopscotch, and never be hit by a flying tip-cat; nay, after these hours the children remain still in the school playground, running about on asphalte without such thing as a doorstep or a kerb, and no gutter in which to sail boats and pick up curious things. They swing; they run round the giant stride; they exercise on parallel bars; they do not dance to a barrel organ, but they are drawn up in rows and are taught a musical drill. If they get away from the school ground it is too often to seek some point of vantage whence, themselves unseen, they may launch the deadly catapult at the passing train. And the old order of the games is changing, giving place to nothing new, but rather chaos. Only the other day it was with the deepest pain that one, who knows what that old order should be, observed—and that not a hundred miles from Marylebone—that marbles are already in! Marbles in June! Peter Parley must have turned in his grave!

MANNERS MAKYTH PARLIAMENT-MAN.

THE great debate on johndillon (for it appears from the practice of the Rev. and Very Very Page Hopps and others to be in some sort a coercionist crime to speak of "Mr. John Dillon," or "Mr. Dillon," and we shall best consult Separatist feelings by speaking of this convict as if he were a johndory) may not rank with the chief oratorical displays even of the present Parliament, though Mr. Balfour has rarely spoken better. With regard to Mr. Gladstone, even the faithful Daily News for the first time in recorded history has been unable to say that he "surpassed all his further efforts," and has even hinted that he rather came short of them. But everything, it has been held by some fantastic philosophers, has some distinctive mark separating it from everything else, and in at least some cases this distinction is a superlative one. The debate on Monday and Tuesday was, we honestly think, the most ill-mannered debate even of this ill-mannered Parliament. We wish we could say that the ill manners were entirely on one side; but one little incident prevents us from enjoying this felicity. When Mr. Chaplin reproached Mr. Gladstone with the being at least part author in the death of Lord Frederick Cavendish, he made a charge which every honest man in the three kingdoms who has chosen to allow himself the use of his senses knows to be true, and one which history will unhesitatingly ratify. But when he went on to accuse Mr. Gladstone of failing memory he committed a gross breach of the decencies of Parliamentary debate, and even of ordinary life, and one which is not a little surprising from a man who, if not as good an orator as Demosthenes or Lord Beaconsfield, is certainly a gentleman. It is not customary among gentlemen, whether there be foundation for the saying or not, to tell an adversary, in effect and to his face, that he is a dotard. Mr. Chaplin has not often anything to learn from Lord Randolph Churchill in point of manners, nor do we often hold up Lord Randolph as a pattern of them; but, if any one contrasts Lord Randolph's speech on the Channel Tunnel with Mr. Chaplin's on johndillon, he will see a remarkable difference. Yet Mr. Gladstone laid himself even more open to such taunts on Wednesday than on Tuesday by his extraordinary and rambling confessions of the reasons why as Prime Minister, three or four years ago, he opposed a project which he now thinks a kind of short cut to Paradise. The only excuse we can make for Mr. Chaplin is that Mr. Gladstone's recent conduct has aroused such abhorrence and disgust in the minds of all patriotic Englishmen that they sometimes forget themselves.

This solitary slip of Mr. Chaplin's, however, though we are sorry that it should have been committed by so good a Tory, is nothing at all compared with the marvellous boorishness of the Opposition. When a party possessing some external respectability amalgamates itself with a party of Yahoos like the Parnellites, it is natural that its manners, never extraordinarily good, should be corrupted yet further by the association. It is fair to Irishmen to say that Sir William Harcourt the other night ran his instructors very close, and that Dr. Tanner and Mr. Redmond must look to their laurels. But, indeed, it is perhaps unnecessary to make any distinction between the component parts of so unanimous a party. During the debate it appears to be admitted that the Ministerialists listened to their adversaries with at least usual courtesy, and in the most strongly Gladstonian reports we find nothing like organized or frequent interruption charged on them. On the other side the following is a brief collection of the performances of those who claim to represent "the great heart of the democracy"—with respect to which claim we can only say that, if it is well founded, the sooner the great heart of the democracy learns how to behave itself the better.

This is how the game went. During the whole of Mr. Morley's long opening speech nothing whatever of the nature of interruption is recorded, and a single correction of Mr. Balfour's of the ordinary debating kind appears to have been the only breach in the thread of the discourse. But no sooner did Mr. Goschen get up than Bedlam seems to have broken loose. The highly provocative exordium "Mr. Speaker" was enough to bring "interruption from the Irish members." The second sentence, hardly more provocative, was greeted, not with the ironical laughter and cheers which, whether wholly reasonable and well-mannered or not, are recognized Parliamentary weapons, but with volleys of denials and "interruptions" generally. And when Mr. Goschen protested, Sir William Harcourt thought it graceful or dignified, or perhaps both, to cry "Go on" to the speaker whom his friends were shouting down. This same cry, which seems to present itself to the Opposition mind as either a crushing argument or a killing joke, was repeated when, in the space of twenty lines of the Times' report, Mr. Morley and Mr. Gladstone had interrupted thrice, and had compelled the speaker to diverge in order to answer them, and again repeated several times in the course of the speech. An interjectory request of Mr. O'Brien's (for Unionists can afford to be fair) calls for no rebuke, being in the ordinary way of business; but soon afterwards Mr. Morley (who really seems to be putting on a new character), Mr. Healy, who was of course in his element, and that eminent lawyer and orator, Mr. R. T. Reid, kept up a running fire of comments which would certainly be ruled out of order in any decently managed school debating society. Mr. Reid himself when he came to speak, except for a correction of Mr. Goschen's, seems to have been listened to with perfect quietness by the Ministerialists, as was also a silly and bumptious maiden speech about his mandate from the newly elect of Ayr, Mr. Sinclair. That the Solicitor-General for Ireland, who intervened between these speakers, fared equally well, may be set, if any one pleases, to the Opposition credit side, and as, though Mr. T. W. Russell was interrupted, Colonel Saunderson was fairly let alone, we must suppose that Gladstonian courtesy is irrespective of persons.

The contrast was even greater on Tuesday. Mr. Chaplin's regrettable error was made in regular debate; Mr. O'Brien and Mr. Sexton were allowed, the one to inveigh and the other to rant, as they liked; and Mr. Gladstone's own speech, provocative enough in all conscience, received no interruptions, except explanations which he himself challenged, and which were made with perfect courtesy. But Mr. Goschen's reception the night before was orderly compared with the behaviour of the Opposition to Mr. Balfour. For a time hears, and cheers, and jeers, with an occasional polite contradiction from Sir William Harcourt, contented the pack; but this soon grew dull and tame. "You are stupid," howls one Honourable Member, to the scandal even of the rather long-suffering Speaker. "So you are," yells another, when Mr. Balfour speaks of his being called a coward. "I did not" is Mr. Gladstone's courteous way of indicating dissent at the same time. "He never said anything of the kind," "Not at all," and again "He did not," are the simultaneous contributions of Sir William Harcourt, Mr. Gladstone, and "an Honourable Member," to the decencies of debate. Shortly after "I say no," and "That is not true either," are ascribed to the amiable Mr. Healy in the course of a few seconds, so that the Speaker had to make the certainly not superfluous remark that "in the interest of the fair conduct of debate he trusted that these constant running commentaries on the remarks of a speaker would cease." But they didn't; and besides miscellaneous interruptions of the inarticulate kind, "running commentaries on the remarks" of Mr. Balfour are ascribed to Mr. Gladstone, Mr. Parnell, Sir William Harcourt, Mr. Gladstone bis, Mr. Gladstone ter, Sir William Harcourt bis [a flat contradiction], Mr. O'Connor, Mr. Harrington, Sir W. Harcourt ter [an enthusiastic ditto to Mr. Harrington], Mr. Gladstone quater, Mr. Gladstone again, Mr. Gladstone toujours, and then a further welter of O'Briens, Harringtons, Redmonds, and Healys, finishing up with the remark again assigned to "an Honourable Member," when Mr. Balfour generously said that he did not doubt the bona-fides of the Opposition, "We doubt yours." That seems to have been the last, and an excellent last too.

Now this extraordinary outburst of brute violence, countenanced and partly shared in by men like Mr. Gladstone, Mr. Morley, and Sir William Harcourt, has, of course, a special as well as a general explanation. The manners of a party, like the strength of a chain, are those of its weakest part; and those who consort with Tanners will soon behave like them. Besides, the Separatists were in a state of furious vexation on Monday and Tuesday. It is still uncertain whether Southampton and Ayr had really intoxicated leaders as well as followers, or whether the rash challenge of last week was a concession to the grumblings of backward leadership which (it is well known) have been for some time past made. But the prompt picking up of the glove, the staunchness of the Liberal-Unionists, and the certainty of a damaging defeat, no doubt aggravated into fury the grumpiness which accompanies all processes of sobering. Nor, from the Unionist point of view, is it altogether disagreeable that the Gladstonian party should show itself in its true light. Still, among the effete "classes" at least, among the wicked literary men who seem to be becoming Mr. Gladstone's regular thunderstorm to turn any required milk, and so forth, there is a kind of lingering respect for the decencies of the British Parliament. Such respect is not to be expected from the sincere votaries of johndillon. But, as it is quite certain that Mr. Gladstone only regards johndillon as a convenient vote wrongfully wrested from him by wicked Mr. Balfour, that Sir William Harcourt regards him as an interesting and useful maniac, and Mr. Morley as a Jacobin rather more convinced than himself, we might expect them to moderate the rancour of their tongues a little. But the cult of johndillon, it would appear, is quite a Moloch cult, and manners, like everything else, even those "very little ones," the manners of Sir William Harcourt, have to be offered up to it.

SHAKSPEARE STAGE-DIRECTIONS.

THE question who is responsible for the stage-directions in Shakspeare has not, we believe, been yet debated. It appears to have escaped the notice of the vainest and acutest commentators. Even those to whom it is meat and drink to inquire into the antecedents of the First Murderer in Macbeth, or to engage in the proof that the husband of the Nurse in Juliet was the original of Joe Miller, and kept a tavern at Chipping Sodbury, have had no word for the Master's utterances to his players. It is still unknown if the gifted Mr. Donnelly, last and greatest of the race, has lumped them in with the rest of Lord Bacon's text, or if he passes them by as too base, common, and popular for the exercise of his mighty mind; but, as the discoverer of the Cryptogram appears to sum up in himself the peculiar virtues of all the Shakspearean commentators that have ever smiled into vacancy, it is fair to assume that he, too, is not concerned with them, and that the subject is practically virgin of attention. The commentator out of work can scarce do better than fall to upon it forthwith. It is full of matter; and if only he be worth his salt—if, for example, he be the equal of him who thought, and still thinks, it possible that "when drawing the character of Proteus Shakspeare had in his mind" (Alas, poor Shakspeare!) "the disloyalty and ingratitude with which the young, handsome, high-born W. H. had treated him"—then the present article will not have been written in vain.

To the loosest thinker it occurs, on a first consideration of the question, that the authorship of the stage-directions is, like that of the plays themselves, a trifle mixed. Some are plainly the Master's own; and some are plainly his stage-manager's. Thus it is as impossible to believe that anybody but Shakspeare (or Bacon) produced the stage-directions in The Tempest as that anybody but Bacon (or Shakspeare) produced The Tempest itself. Was it Bacon? was it Shakspeare? The old superstition in the player's favour being still afoot, it will be proper (for the present at least) to call the author Shakspeare, and to remark that Shakspeare's stage-directions are touched with something of the same magical felicity of style which distinguishes Shakspeare's verse. A case in point occurs in Act iii., scene 3, when "Enter several strange Shapes, bringing in a banquet"; they "dance about it with gentle actions of salutation"; and "inviting the King, &c., to eat, they depart." Here Mr. Donnelly may only see a new proof that Bacon was a man with a strain of good breeding which in a mere player like Shakspeare was impossible; while any one with a feeling for literature (a quality which Mr. Donnelly appears to be able, like some others of his countrymen, to do without) will find the whole passage delightful in itself, and, returning again and again to the second phrase, "They dance about it with gentle actions of salutation," will linger on it as your true drinker will linger on a sip of Clos de Vougeôt. There is something of the same quality in the next of the Master's rubrics, when to thunder and lightning, Enter Ariel, like a harpy; claps his wings upon the table; and, with a quaint device, the banquet vanishes. The poet, indeed, appears to have had a special kindness for his spirits, for a few verses further on, when Ariel's part is done, He vanishes in thunder; then, to soft music, enter the Shapes again, and dance, with mocks and mows, and carrying out the table. Scarce less pleasant is that direction in the Masque (Act iv.) when Juno and Ceres whisper, and send Iris on employment, which is as prettily and gracefully conceived and expressed as need be. Best of all, perhaps, is the description of the means by which the same device is brought to an end, when, the stage being already rich in the presence of "Certain Nymphs," there enter "Certain Reapers properly habited," who "join with the Nymphs in a graceful dance; towards the end thereof Prospero starts suddenly and speaks"; after which—this last phrase is really incomparable—"to a strange, hollow, and confused noise they heavily vanish." Another note of the same sort—"Re-enter Ariel loaden with glistering apparel"—has merit, and so has the reappearance of that brilliant and enchanting spirit "with the Master and Boatswain amazedly following"; but after the rare interest of their predecessors—after the "gentle actions of salutation," and the

"strange, hollow, and confused noise" to which the masquers "heavily vanish"—they fall, it must be owned, a trifle flat. The Master, indeed, is seldom at this height of invention in this part of his work. In Antony and Cleopatra, for instance, to indicate the working of the passing of Hercules—that extraordinary piece of romance which, though it impedes his action, and on the Elizabethan boards can scarce have been found either effective or suggestive, he was yet constrained to adapt from Plutarch—he contents himself with a simple "Music of the hautboys as under the stage." He is fully himself, however, in the "Enter RUMOUR, painted full of tongues," of the Induction to Henry the Fifth, and, we like to believe, in the "Enter PRINCE HENRY and POINS, marching. FALSTAFF meets them, playing on his truncheon like a fife," of an earlier number of the series. His most elaborate essay in realization is unquestionably that description of the Vision which appears to the dying Katharine of Aragon. It is too long to quote; but every good Shakspearean knows it, and every Shakspearean who is not good (a manifest impossibility, surely?) is hereby exhorted to go and achieve its knowledge. It is full of delightful things. "Enter, solemnly tripping after one another," it begins, "six personages, clad in white robes." They have "on their heads garlands of bays, and golden vizards on their faces," with "branches of bays or palm in their hands"; and, being thus equipped, "they first congee unto her, then dance," and, during the dance, "at certain changes the first two hold a spare garland over her head." This goes on, in Elizabethan English, until the spare garland has been "held over her head" by all the personages in succession; till, the last pair doing this office, "as it were by inspiration, she makes in her sleep signs of rejoicing, and holdeth up her hands to heaven." "And so," the poet goes on, "in their dancing vanish, carrying the garland with them." The thing is delightful to read; and as stage-managed ("stag-magged" is what the heirs of Shakspeare call it) by the Master himself, or by his supposed collaborator in King Henry the Eighth, the renowned John Fletcher, it may have been convincing enough. All the same, one cannot help contrasting this quaint and strange romance in action with some of the imaginings of J.-B.-P. de Molière, and reflecting that, scenically at least, the romantic touch is of necessity less practical, and in a work-a-day sense less satisfying, than the merely comic. The reflection is borne in upon us with still greater force when we come to consider the dumb show which is played to Imogen's Posthumus in prison. "Solemn music," it begins; then "Enter as in an apparition . . . an old man attired like a warrior, leading in his hand an antient matron, his wife . . . with music before them"; and thereafter, "other music" preceding them, "follow the two young LEONATI, brothers to POSTHUMUS," distinguished and remarkable "with wounds, as they died in the wars." After this, as we all know, comes a screed of verse; and then, the principals in the vision having declared themselves, "JUPITER descends in thunder and lightning, sitting upon an eagle; he throws a thunderbolt. The Ghosts fall upon their knees." There is no more than that. One has to read the speech of the principal Ghost after the vanishing of Jupiter—

He came in thunder; his celestial breath
Was sulphurous to smell; the holy eagle
Stooped as to foot us; his ascension is More sweet than our blest fields; his royal bird
Prunes the immortal wing and cloys his beak,
As when his god is pleased—to feel what all this naïve yet far-reaching effect of pageantry meant to the poet himself. The inevitable conclusion is not favourable to the claims, as a practical genre, of romantic drama. Poetry, in fact, is not necessarily drama. The two are by no means incompatible, as Shakspeare has shown, not once, but many times; but, as Shakspeare has magnificently shown, the two are not inseparable. Making every allowance for differences—differences of talent, differences of ideal, differences of art, differences of material—one is irresistibly reminded in this connexion of a reflection of Alexandre Dumas. He was comparing himself with Hugo, and wishing he could only write as well as the greater artist in words; he went on to remark that what Hugo wanted in his plays was a world of secret passages, masks, cliquetis d'épées, choruses of monks, lightning and thunder, coffins, Mysterious Strangers, and so forth; and, with the admirable frankness which distinguished him, he concluded, recalling the stern and vigorous simplicity of Antony and Térésa, that all that he required was "quatre tréteaux, quatre planches, deux acteurs, et une passion." The definition is comprehensive enough to include the whole of drama—from the Oresteia to La Tosca; but it says nothing about poetry. In truth, the function of poetry in drama is principally decorative; and one cannot avoid a suspicion that Dumas, who was impudent enough for anything, would have questioned some of Shakspeare's decoration as sharply as he questioned the most of Hugo's.

THE SALON.

II.

ALMOST the only style of treatment which could safely be adopted in dealing seriously with a legend containing within itself so many elements of the grotesque as that of St. Denis would be to make of it a fantastic vision after the fashion of M. Gustave Moreau. M. Paul-Louis Delance has taken a serious but prosaic view of the subject in his "Légende de St. Denis"—a large work executed in the modern grey-and-buff tonality, with much breadth and spirit. Especially to be remarked is the admirably drawn and modelled figure of a half-nude peasant who springs forward fascinated at the sight of the decapitated saint, slowly advancing head in hand. A real imaginative quality has been imparted to M. Leenhardt's large work, "Marie-Madeleine," by the beautiful treatment of the vast and solemn landscape, illuminated by the mysterious light of earliest morning, in which the Magdalen stands erect near the open sepulchre. Full of a quaint invention which comes very near to, but does not exactly attain, this same imaginative quality, is M. Surand's "St. Georges et le Monstre," in which the knightly saint appears, in full armour of mediæval type, in the act of tilting at the dragon, whom he interrupts at the moment when he is about to rend two nude and helpless victims. This sleepy, lizard-like monster, with its covering of strange pale green and bright blue scales and its terrible claws, is a veritable creation, as happy as it is original.

M. Jules Lefebvre sends a large genre subject, "L'Orpheline," showing an aged woman and a young child, who, clothed in deep mourning, kneel at prayer in a village church. The treatment of the work is, as might have been expected, idealistic, and the drawing admirable in its firmness and severity; the drawbacks are the usual ones of a certain affected purism of style and a too great insistence on line and contour. The master's little portrait of a young girl—Mlle. Saléta-Ricord—shows his best qualities in even a higher degree than the more important performance. Under what head are we to class M. Gervex's foolishly-named "Le Tub," a picture which displays much ability and an enthusiastic striving after novelty in colour, wasted on a trivial subject? We see a modern Parisian lady erect in her bath in an attitude not dissimilar to that of the Aphrodite of Cnidos; she is tended by a handmaiden soberly attired in black and grey, the group being lighted by the cold rays of a morning sun filtering through closed blinds. The painter reveals the same curiosity in colour-problems in his full-length of Mlle. Jeanne Harding (not to be confounded with Mlle. Jane Hading), masquerading in a Japanese coiffure and a magnificent red and citron-coloured robe of the same exotic fashion. M. Roll—unrepresented this year by any of those huge modern subjects by the naturalistic treatment of which he has won his reputation—sends a life-size portrait-study of a farm-girl, entitled "Manda Lamétrie, fermière." It is full of freshness and vitality, and happily renders the aspect of the human form seen in the open air; but it is, like all the painter's productions, deficient in firmness and solidity, and too imperfectly indicates the muscular structure of the model. The masters of pure modern genre are not in great force this year. Can it be that the partial reaction which, in current literature and on the stage, has shown itself in France against that mere everyday realism which reproduces, without either enlarging or intensifying, the subjects with which it deals, has already extended itself to painting? As we have already pointed out, that keen and cynical observer of modern Parisian life in all its phases, M. Beraud, is entirely unrepresented. M. Raffaëlli sends only an eccentric portrait of M. Edmond de Goncourt in his study, and many other masters of this peculiar branch have turned their attention elsewhere.

Very humorous, and painted with an uncompromising hardness and directness which are under the circumstances highly appropriate, is M. Brispot's "Le Départ pour la Mairie," a quaint marriage scene, in which the chief actors appear amusingly ill at ease in the formal garments which they have donned for the occasion. M. Marec's "Ici on est mieux qu'en face—Retour de l'Enterrement" shows, in a Parisian tavern of the banlieue, a company of humble but decent mourners seeking rest and refreshment after a funeral ceremony. The work is conceived with a grim humour which does not exclude pathos, and is admirably lighted and altogether well carried out, though with something too much of deliberation in the execution. The accomplished M. Edelfelt is less happy than usual in his "Devant l'Église, Finlande," in which are seen a number of women congregated outside a church, wearing kirtles of various shades of red. The manner in which these predominating hues have been dealt with is happy; but the touch reveals a certain hesitation unusual to this painter. The Bavarian Herr Kühl shows himself as conscientious an observer and as ardent a student of the fashionable problems of light as ever in two wholly Teutonic genre scenes—"Le Maître de Chapelle" and "Joueur de Cartes." His experiments are interesting, and he shows a certain respect for his subjects which is not altogether usual in French works of this class; there is, however, in the transparency of his atmosphere a certain undue glassiness, and in his figures a corresponding brittleness of texture, which interfere with the complete realization of the effects at which he aims. M. Moreau de Tours has gone back either a little too far or not far enough for his military subject; he conjures up a scene from the Crimean War, "Le Drapeau—Assaut de Malakoff (8 Septembre 1855)." The incident of the finding of the flag after the assault, still closely grasped in the hands of the dead ensign, is treated with great spirit and pathos, but with a uniform heaviness of execution and a failure to emphasize the essential elements of the composition, which seriously detract from the pictorial impression first received. The sculptor M. Falguière, who has never attempted to emancipate himself in painting from the influence of M. Henner, sends "Nains Mendiants," a fine tone-exercise in the manner of his master, into which, however, a new element derived from a direct study of Velasquez is introduced. The figures of two hideous and deformed dwarfs, the brownish hue of whose flesh and garments is uniform, are relieved against a turquoise sky of exquisite richness and purity.

In the French exhibition of the year, as in its English equivalent, the portraits form one of the most satisfactory and distinctive sections of the show. Nothing equals the splendid energy of execution or the powerful relief of M. Bonnat's two portraits—one a head of M. Jules Ferry, the other a full-length of Cardinal Lavigerie, robed in his undress vestments of black, relieved with an outer robe and bands of the most trenchant and unmitigated scarlet. The technical power triumphantly asserted by the master exercises so commanding an influence that it is not until later that we perceive his comparative failure to grasp the inner, as distinguished from the mere physical, individuality of his distinguished sitters. M. Carolus-Duran's "Portrait de ma Fille" appeared last year in London, but, as it seems to us, in a less definitive state than it now assumes. Nothing can be more novel or more brilliant than the colour-combination—black and steel-grey, combined with shot-violet, and relieved against the vibrating tones of a vieil-or background—while the beautiful face of the young sitter is rendered with much charm, though without any special individuality. M. Cabanel yearly delights the great ladies of the Faubourg who compete for the honour of posing before him by conventional presentments, in which their distinction is emphasized to the verge of vulgarity, at the expense of all the higher qualities of vitality and true distinctiveness. The painter's mastery in mere draughtsmanship and design is acknowledged; but it is in portrait-painting that the inherent defects of his style and the limits of his intellectual capacity make themselves most strongly felt. The art of the distinguished painter-sculptor, M. Paul Dubois—reticent and not readily yielding to the observer its finer qualities—is in direct contrast with that of M. Cabanel. His two portraits of this year, admirably modelled though they are, lack some of the firmness of former examples. M. Dubois has selected the full-face or three-quarters view of his sitters, and seems less at home in painting these aspects than in dealing with his favourite profile of the human face. M. Jean-Paul Laurens contributes a melodramatic profile of M. Mounet-Sully in the part of Hamlet, and an Ophelia seen in the recounted scene of her watery death. These works still further emphasize the truth of the saying that M. Laurens—whether the subject he represents be legendary, historical, religious, or dramatic—always revels in a "fifth-act" atmosphere of tragedy. M. Clairin supplies a still more melodramatic, if less vigorous, presentment of the French Hamlet, in the act of drawing his sword.

M. J. S. Sargent's justly-lauded "Mrs. Playfair" fully maintains the position it conquered at the Academy, vindicating its right to be considered as one of the most consummate pieces of portraiture which have been executed during the last decade. Mr. Orchardson is represented by his fine "Portrait of Mrs. Joseph," a work sympathetic and dignified of aspect but appearing intolerably hot in colour in a French picture-gallery. Mr. Jacomb-Hood's "Portrait de mon Frère" is a highly successful attempt to relieve white on a ground of white—the sitter appearing in a complete suit of white flannels.

Of fine landscapes, marine and architectural subjects—painted chiefly from a decorative standpoint—there is no lack. That older and nobler school of what might be styled subjective landscape is still upheld by a few painters. The austere yet satisfying art of M. Harpignies is not specially well illustrated; but his pupil, M. Odier, contributes a grandly designed "Les bords de la Loire à St.-Maurice." M. Pelouse supplies a vast and learnedly drawn study of trees in "Le Matin sous Bois," in which, however, the flickering light forcing its way through dense foliage is not rendered with convincing truth. Were the art of M. Pointelin as varied as it is exquisite, he would stand alone as the perpetuator of the style and aims of the great school now, alas! well nigh extinct. His colour-harmony of steel-grey and dark green is more limited and more conventional than that of Corot, but the skill and the pathetic power with which he uses his limited materials are as unquestionable as in the case of the elder master; the oil-painting "Le Point du Jour" and the pastel "Automne" have for noble simplicity and subtlety of suggestion no parallels in the exhibition. The veteran M. Charles-Emile Jacque shows, on a scale which he has not hitherto attempted, "Le Grand Troupeau au Pâturage"—a life-size shepherd and sheep advancing in a green plain under a stormy sky; there is about the rendering of this too-often repeated subject a superb breadth and sincerity, though the touch does not reveal a decision quite equal to its largeness. M. Mesdag shows two companion seapieces, masterly yet less interesting than those of last year; and M. Montenard repeats his rough but powerful effects of sunlit, orange-hued rock and sail, contrasting with the deep blue of the Mediterranean. Few things here have a rarer or a more melancholy charm than M. Demont's "Les Œillettes"—a field of pale-violet field-poppies seen in the mysterious light which yet lingers after sundown; the technical skill, too, shown in treating this mass of a delicate but dangerous colour is most remarkable. Not for a long time has so masterly an architectural painting appeared at the Salon as M. Lansyer's "Institut de France," a representation of the well-known edifice, which in execution is worthy to rank with the best works of Van der Heyden, though it has not the charm or the power of suggestion which the Dutch painter knew how to impart to his least promising subjects.

If no very striking or original conception makes memorable the exhibition of sculpture, the level of technical skill shown is as high as ever, and the task of sifting the wheat from the chaff thus becomes an extremely difficult one. The great contemporary masters of sculpture are almost all of them represented, but, with few exceptions, only by works of no very aspiring character. That idealist M. Chapu is not seen to the highest advantage in a modern subject—the marble group of "Les frères Galignani"; while the passionate and delicate art of M. Mercié as little asserts itself to the full in an anonymous marble portrait-statue destined for a tomb. M. Delaplanche has supplied a colossal statue of Homer, necessarily somewhat conventional, yet giving an admirable version of the well-known type; his marble statue, "La Danse," is full of the suggestion of vivacious movement, while it avoids exaggeration. M. Falguière's splendidly modelled, if overdaring, "Diane," which was shown here some two years ago in plaster, now reappears in marble. M. Injalbert, in "La Renommée," falls far short of the triumphs which, in the more than questionable Berninesque style, he achieved last year. If the médaille d'honneur could have been given for a mere bust, it should certainly have been accorded to M. Rodin for his magnificent "Portrait de Mme. M. V.," a work which reveals him in a new light as dwelling lovingly on feminine charm and dignity; it may fairly take rank with the fine specimens of the Florentine art of the fifteenth century. M. Rodin's friendly rival, the more popular M. Dalou, has been somewhat overbold in daring comparisons with the former master in his bronze bust of M. Rochefort; M. Dalou's showy and brilliant version of the Communistic journalist's well-known features cannot be placed beside M. Rodin's more living and more deeply individual presentment of the same strange personality. Space is wanting even to refer to the many consummately skilful performances of less universally known artists. Among these we should be inclined to accord the palm to M. Turcan's noble and pathetic group, "L'Aveugle et le Paralytique," and to M. Eugène Robert's cleverly imagined piece of Græco-Roman work, "Une Lutte dans les Bois." This last shows a youth who, with set teeth and determined mien, manfully battles with a fox. We must, much against our will, altogether pass over the sections of architectural drawing and engraving in all its branches, which form so happy a complement to the sections of painting and sculpture.

THE STORY OF THE LONDON POLICE.

V.

IN taking a comprehensive survey of the actual condition of the Metropolitan Police, as we find it at a moment when it is supposed by some to have almost attained practical perfection, it will be well, ere endeavouring to pass judgment, condemnatory or favourable, upon them, to glance at the duties which they are paid and expected to perform. Apart from their proper function of watchmen, the metropolitan constables are regulators of the traffic, perform a rough-and-ready kind of ambulance work in respect of street accidents, illness, and drunkenness, and must be ready at any time to answer questions on every imaginable subject which may be put to them alike by provincials, foreigners, and town-bred folk, of whom it may be safely asserted that the last are by far the most exigent in their demands, and ofttimes most brusque in their mode of interrogation. No doubt the regulation of the street traffic is one of the hardest nuts which the police have to crack. Mr. A. C. Howard, one of the four chief constables and district superintendents, is "desirous of drawing special attention to the part of the Report submitted by the" (Police) "Board on traffic, in which they point out the insufficient width of roadway at Piccadilly Circus; two triangular spaces have been left in the centre, one of which is flagged, and the other—and largest—is enclosed with a wooden paling, being intended apparently for the erection of a statue. However desirable such an erection may be, it would be a great pity, I consider, to carry it out at the expense of the roadway; yet, if some alteration is not made, such will be the case." Here Mr. Howard is, of course, arguing from his own belief, with the full knowledge that such a cutting up of a space like Piccadilly Circus means great extra labour for his men and corresponding dissatisfaction on the part of the public, to whom this particular part of the West-End is a continual vexation and annoyance. The widening of the Circus and the opening of Shaftesbury Avenue and Charing Cross Road have admittedly thrown much additional labour on to the constables of No. 2 district (which, by the way, comprises five divisions—Marylebone, Holborn, Hampstead, Kilburn, and Highgate), and, to quote Chief Constable Howard, the "great increase of vehicular traffic is likely to go on indefinitely." This section of the "fashionable" quarter is that to which the newspapers pay special attention, and it has furnished leader-writers with a theme for endless discussion, "the condition of the West-End" or "the police and the West-End" being recognized stock topics for editorial treatment when nothing more attractive presents itself. We naturally had this street sapping of the Metropolitan Police in mind when arguing last week for an increase in the existing number of constables, and we press it again now as being an incontestable proof that, if the adequate regulation of the street traffic is to coincide with the proper protection of life and property, the force must be augmented without further delay. The recent catastrophe in the Edgware Road reminds us that another vitally important function which the constable is called upon with painful frequency to discharge is that of fireman; though the valuable services in this direction rendered by the police are only referred to in the reports of the chief constable and superintendents in a kind of "aside." In connexion with the police regulation of the traffic in the West-End mention must be made of another important rôle of the metropolitan constable; that of a moveron of those whom for convenience sake we will term disorderly women. It is here that the constable finds himself laid most open to attack by the "screeching sisterhood" of the penny press. The St. James's district is ruled by the C Division, and Mr. Superintendent Hume tells us that, of the 4,879 persons charged at the two stations of that division and taken before magistrates, 1,407 were "disorderly women," who infest the leading thoroughfares in such great numbers as to cause the inhabitants and shopkeepers to "complain bitterly of the nuisance and injury to their business." This evil has become more and more apparent within the last three years, until now the police, harried on this side, badgered on that, are seemingly at their wits' end to know how to act. "The existence of a great scandal," says Mr. Hume, "is entirely due to the defective state of the law, and the evil must sooner or later be met by fresh legislation." This is indeed "the bitter cry" of the police; and, the "black sheep" part of the business aside, the public generally, and one would think Parliament also, will concur in this sensible and common-sense, though official, view of what may be described as the great social question of the day. It is only here and there in the reports that a slight approach to wailing and lamentation is noticeable; the wonder is that the superintendent reporters do not more frequently give way to their lacerated feelings and declare, in the slightly satirical language of Mr. J. Keating (of the J, or Bethnal Green, Division), that "the usual practice" is to "blame the police, forgetting the fact that policemen are only human and cannot perform miracles." It is to be regretted (and we speak from personal observation) that the police are not only a "mark" for the ribald "chaff" and horseplay of the "gentlemen" and their imitators who, like the miserable women referred to, "infest" the West-End thoroughfares, but a greater mark than ever. This is particularly noticeable in the B (Westminster) and C (St. James's) Divisions, where the arrest of a drunken or disorderly person in the streets is usually the signal either for an attempt at a rescue or for the letting loose of a flood of vile language on the part of the "loafing" bystanders. The demeanour of the police in assault cases, the vituperation with which they occasionally assail those who consider it their duty to offer a word of remonstrance or advice in street "rows," and their not infrequent "cussedness"—the outcome, nine times out of ten, of natural obtuseness—have been commented on ad nauseam by the sharpshooters of the press; but, in considering the general conduct of the Metropolitan constabulary, we must not forget either the heavy strain put upon their patience or the manifold temptations to which they are subjected.

GREEK STATUETTES.

THE Burlington Fine Arts Club has opened a very charming exhibition of Greek ceramic art, consisting chiefly of examples of Tanagra figures, and, in all probability, no such gathering of these marvellous statuettes has ever been seen before. The painted vases are, no doubt, very fine; but it is impossible to look at them until we have thoroughly satisfied our eyes with the little figures. As is well known, Tanagra is not the only place where they have been found; and it is very possible that discoveries may be made in other burial grounds which will increase the number of specimens and our knowledge, still very slight, of their meaning and origin. It is said that the necropolis of Tanagra was opened in 1872 by some peasants working in their fields, who found a stone sarcophagus filled, as they expressed it, with "dolls." When these dolls were first brought over to Paris and London their genuineness was doubted; and even now forgeries do not seem to be very uncommon. At first, however, the price at which they were offered was so low that it is not easy to see how forgery could be made remunerative; and, as many amateurs remarked, even forgeries so beautiful as these had a value of their own. In short, it was felt by collectors that, whether ancient or modern, these exquisite statuettes were works of genius, and the lucky folk who bought the first few examples have the pleasure of finding that their property is now worth as many pounds as it cost them shillings. It is said in the preface to the Catalogue that "a space of several kilomètres has been explored along each side of the road between Athens and Chalkis, and at least ten thousand terra-cottas have come out of those tombs." The typical Tanagra figure represents "a draped maiden who appears to be walking in the street." There are twelve of these figures in the present exhibition, all very much alike, but at the same time easily distinguished. Each shows individual taste, and it is difficult to know which shows the most. Another and even more charming type shows us a girl seated on a couch or a chair. Some of these have more than a trace of colour and gilding left. One, in particular, which is exhibited by Sir William Drake, and is partly of this type, shows us a most graceful figure playing with a dove. She is seated on a rock, and the dove is frightened by a lizard. Even more beautiful is the statuette from Attica representing a woman seated and stooping forward to put on her shoe. It belongs to Mr. van Branteghem, as does a marvellous group of two girls seated on a sarcophagus, talking earnestly. "In ancient Greece," says the Catalogue, "the tombs were placed in rows on either side of the high roads, and the passers by must often have sat down upon them, and entered into conversation. The subject of the group is therefore borrowed from the daily life of the ancients, and the artist has treated it so naturally and cleverly that it would be difficult to surpass him." The gem of Mr. van Branteghem's extensive collection seems to us to be a group numbered 173. It represents a young mother bending over her child. She wears a "chiton," and a pink "himation"; her right arm supports her, and the left hand is to her breast. The child stretches its arms towards her. She wears earrings, and her ringlets fall on her neck. There is a good deal of colour left on this group, which comes from Tanagra. There are several examples of what the Catalogue calls "The Oracle of Love"; a young girl casting lots with knuckle-bones. One of them is very elaborately modelled and coloured. She has a pink "chiton," with a wide blue border fastened at the shoulders with "fibulæ." She wears earrings; and has white shoes with red soles. Several figures are grouped with chairs, some leaning on them, others seated. One chair (192) seems constructed to fold up. The female figure in this same example is of superlative beauty and elaborately vested, the veil showing that she is a married woman. "A mere description," says the Catalogue, "is powerless to render the charm of this figure, the ease of its pose, its grace, and abandon; or its style, worthy of the greatest works in statuary." We cannot enumerate everything, but would call special attention to some larger groups from Asia Minor, and to the head of a life-sized statue found at Rome. It belongs to Mr. Fortnum, and is of the best period of Greek art. The statue, of which it formed a part, must have adorned a tomb and represented a figure in mourning. The collection of cups and vases is rather choice than extensive. It contains examples bearing the names of the artists by whom they were painted, among which we may notice Nikosthenes, Andokides, Epiktetos, and Pamphaios. After the time of Perikles, artists seldom signed their works. We have wholly overlooked the numerous little figures of Cupids and children both modelled and painted on vases; but as is so often the case with exhibitions at this club, where practically everything is a masterpiece in its way, it is only possible to mention the more striking objects.

MR. DALY'S TAMING OF THE SHREW AGAIN.

A THIRD visit to the Gaiety Theatre, where Mr. Augustus Daly's Company of Comedians—we confess to a liking for this old-fashioned phrase—are playing the Taming of the Shrew, has confirmed our opinion that this is one of the very best Shakspearian performances to be seen in London of late years; in fact, we are inclined to hazard a doubt whether, all things considered, a more satisfactory representation of a comedy of Shakspeare's has been given since the breaking up of the mighty companies of the old patent theatres. Mr. Daly's adroit adaptation of Shakspeare's text approves itself on better acquaintance; it is respectful and skilful; it utilizes every hint of the original; and it is modest in its modifications, of which there must needs be a many. The bringing together, in close connexion, of the two scenes of wife-taming is a little violent, but it was perhaps unavoidable. The treatment of the Induction is excellent; we have just enough of the rather primitive practical joke which the anonymous Lord plays on Christopher Sly to amuse and to give a flavour, and not enough to fatigue or annoy. It has been assumed hitherto that Sly is of necessity a dull beery tippler and a mere sodden drunkard. Certainly this is not Mr. Gilbert's interpretation of the character. After watching for the third time the American comedian's brisk, alert, and humorous performance of the part, we are less rigid in asserting our own view, although we are not yet wholly converted to Mr. Gilbert's, brilliantly as he sets it forth. And yet, why may he not be right after all? It is but a poor profile of a character which every actor and every critic may not walk around and see every one from his own angle of observation. And it is an accepted axiom of dramatic criticism that an accomplished comedian or tragedian is authorized to make over the characters of the great dramatists to suit his own individuality so long as he is consistent and cautious. No man can deny that Mr. Gilbert is most consistent in the presentation of his conception of the intoxicated and bewildered tinker.

The new and beautiful scenery which Mr. Daly has provided is in general so well devised for its purpose that we are surprised to discover in one set what appears like an odd blunder. The alehouse from which Christopher Sly is ignominiously expelled is called on the playbill "An Inn upon a Heath," but, instead of being characteristically English, it seems strangely Italian, though the story of the Taming of the Shrew is Italian. The scenes of the Induction, the Lord and the tinker, the practical joke—these are all English. This Italianizing of the alehouse is the only error to be remarked in the mounting of the play at the Gaiety, which in other respects is admirable and a model of the proper subordination of scenery to action. There is just now both in England and France a strong tendency to exalt the decorator above the dramatist—and the tendency is fatal to dramatic art. Mr. Daly gives a sumptuous and splendid setting to the final scene of the last act of the Taming of the Shrew; but this is all well enough, for a play may properly end with a blaze of light; and, besides, the last scene is rather vacant of action and effect, and the spectacular is here used adroitly to supplement the deficiencies of the story. In general scenery should be kept down in its proper place as the handmaiden of acting. When Mr. Irving was last in America he took his whole company to the Military Academy at West Point, on the Hudson River, and acted The Merchant of Venice before the cadets on a stage in their mess-hall, without scenery, with curtains only, and with a lowered placard now and again announcing the supposed change of scene. Mr. Irving's Shylock and Miss Terry's Portia lost none of their charm or power by this frank paucity of decoration; and those who were privileged to witness this performance declare that never was there a more effective performance by the Lyceum company. Of course this is an austerity for grand occasions only; the incident is recalled here only to emphasize a protest against extreme scenic over-elaboration—a fault Mr. Daly does not fall into. Like Mr. Irving, Mr. Daly makes an ingenious and artistic use of music, and the introduction of Sir Henry Bishop's "Should he upbraid" in the final scene is singularly happy. The costumes, which we understand to have been designed by Mr. E. Hamilton Bell, are not only rich and handsome and well contrasted, but they are in all cases unusually appropriate both to the actor who has to wear them and to the character he is impersonating. This is the very fine art of costuming—that the clothes, beautiful in themselves, serve also as an immediate suggestion of character. What, for example, could be a more fitting garment for Katherine the curst than the flame-coloured robe in which Miss Ada Rehan makes her triumphant entry, "a splendid animal in a splendid rage"? Nor is this the only subtlety in costuming to be seen now at the Gaiety, and rarely elsewhere. Of Miss Rehan's Katherine, as of Mr. Drew's "Petrucio," there is no need now to say more than we have said; they are among the most memorable and the most absolutely satisfactory Shakspearian impersonations ever seen in London. Miss Rehan's cries of defiant rage linger on the ear, and so does Mr. Drew's brilliant bravura delivery of verse, a rare accomplishment. Indeed, the diction of the company as a whole is very remarkable; almost every actor in the company seems to have discovered the secret of blank verse.

ANTIQUITIES AT THE EGYPTIAN HALL.

MR. FLINDERS PETRIE has been exploring and digging during the past winter in the Fayoum, and the result of his labours is to be seen in the gallery of the Society of Female Artists at the Egyptian Hall. The most interesting of the objects he has brought back are of a very late period; but, historically, the most important are the remains of the colossal statue of Amenemhat III., a king of the remote Twelfth Dynasty. To this king is always attributed the great scheme for storing the excess of the annual inundation of the Nile by the formation of a vast lake with dams and locks. This lake, in Egyptian Me-ur, the "Great Water," is called by Herodotus and the Greeks "Mœris," and has been described over and over again. Herodotus also describes two vast granite statues which marked the entrance of the lake; and his description is one of the points to which some sceptical modern commentators have taken exception. But Mr. Petrie's researches demonstrate his accuracy. Two great pyramidal structures rose from the surface of Mœris. They each concealed a square base which supported a statue of the king. Mr. Petrie has brought home some fragments of one of these statues. They are of red granite, or syenite, polished like a mirror, and consist of part of a colossal face, of a seat or throne and its ornaments, and of the oval or cartouche which bore the king's name. Other remains were found which go to confirm the truth of the account given by Herodotus, and to identify the site of Mœris. Unfortunately we must give up one of the pleasant theories put forward by Lepsius. That eminent German Egyptologist was always so sure, and stated his views so convincingly, that until Mr. Petrie came on the scene no one thought for a moment of doubting their soundness. Some years ago Mr. Petrie demolished the well-known "accretion" theory by which Herr Lepsius had accounted for the growth of pyramids. Now he comes forward to upset Herr Lepsius again, this time over the remains which that learned German identified as the Labyrinth, with its three thousand chambers. The ruins turn out to be those of a village of the Roman period, probably founded and built on the remains of older structures, possibly the Labyrinth. A little further south Mr. Petrie made some very curious discoveries. The most conspicuous objects in the room come from a cemetery near Howara, but belonging evidently to the chief town of the Fayoum, the ancient Arsinoë, now Medinet. It seems to date from about 300 B.C. to the first century of the Christian era. Greek influence is very strong, but the old gods of the Egyptians were still worshipped, and some of the names, though written in Greek characters, are purely Egyptian. The mummies, in most cases, had a portrait attached—not a piece of sculpture, as on the older coffins, but a painting, and some thirty of these curious memorials are hung round the walls, and are perfectly startling in their lifelike appearance. Some of the female faces are very beautiful; some of the men are represented with an almost brutal fidelity; and there are some children, exquisitely painted. There are, also, some mummy cases, with the faces in relief and highly gilt and coloured. Two of these represent little girls, and are placed in the corners of the gallery. They are, for the most part, wrapped in a kind of oilcloth, linen soaked in some stiffening preparation, the head and feet being specially protected with separate cases. Others have linen bandages wrapped round them in intricate folds and patterns. Some of them, though apparently laid in the bare ground, are marvellously well preserved, and show that even at so late a period the traditions of the embalmers were still strictly preserved and followed.

Among the smaller objects exhibited are a number of shoes, slippers, and sandals of all kinds, including a very modern-looking pair of cork soles. A slightly injured glass vase is very precious, as showing that the art of "wheel-cutting" is as old as the Christian era at least. A picture, very faint, remains in its frame, which is of the pattern we know as "Oxford," with the crossed corners. There is a groove in the woodwork, apparently for a pane of glass. On another table are some toys, such as a rag-doll, and curious little figures in terracotta, including a model of a sedan-chair, with its bearers, and a lady seated within.

One table is covered with examples of flowers and wreaths, and the modern botanical name has been carefully attached to each. The number of different flowers is considerable, pointing to a knowledge of gardening hitherto unrecognized. On another table are examples of a different vegetable, the papyrus. Mr. Petrie does not seem to have found much of this kind; but one specimen still unrolled has been inscribed with a portion of the Iliad in very ancient Greek letters.

Besides the objects found in these tombs—objects which reveal the existence of a civilization and a school of art at a period about which we have hitherto known little or nothing—the older and better known Egyptian art is also well represented by a cabinet full of beautiful jewelry, bronzes, ivories, and other antiquities; and by Mr. Petrie's extensive and valuable collection of regal scarabs, among which is one inscribed with the name of Mr. Rider Haggard's heroine, Queen Amenardas or Ameniritis. Mr. Petrie has been encouraged by private enterprise to undertake the explorations which have resulted in the collection of the objects now exhibited, and proposes to return to Egypt to continue his researches next winter.

THE HANDEL FESTIVAL.

MR. MANNS conducted the Festival of 1885 with generally acknowledged success, and on the present occasion he has done even better. It must be said also that, on the whole, soloists, chorus, and orchestra have done their best to assist him. At the last Festival the sopranos were perhaps rather weak and wanting in freshness; this time the vocal parts are much more justly balanced. Still, the Festival is not altogether what it should be, though it seems to suit the many who perhaps take their Handel as a kind of religious blessing not to be inquired into or discussed. Others, however, who have some real respect for Handel, some curiosity as to his ideas and methods, and some taste in loud noises might be induced to attend a performance of a different kind. Certain bad Handel traditions die hard; but we suppose that even those to whom the present brazen tumult is agreeable would scarcely be adverse to a finer and more truly Handelian quality of sound, provided it were equally loud. It seems strange that we should presume to rearrange the effects of a master of whom a no less consummate artist said, "He knows how to strike like a thunderbolt when he wishes." We seem to think he wished too seldom, and was incompetent when he did. It may be said with justice that delicate additional filling up parts are desirable, and were understood by the composer; but this argument can scarcely sanction the use of an entirely different order of effects. Vast engines of brass topped by harsh cornets spoil the purity of volume and the clearness of structure of the choruses at most of the fortes. They blurt out a few notes with a tone of coarse rousing quality that separates itself from the ensemble of sound like a patch of paint on a wall. One is worked up by an interesting play of the parts to expect a grand moment; instead, the effect is drowned in brass. That the noise happens generally to be in tune hardly affects the question of quality. Moreover, these coarse blares of sound not only destroy the passages in which they occur, but deaden the rest, and stifle any feeling for delicate nuance of piano and forte in the chorus.

The "Selections" (Wednesday) and the Israel in Egypt (Friday) must be considered fully next week. We may say a word, however, of what was done from them at the rehearsal on the Friday of last week. Most of the choruses from Israel were disfigured by the ludicrous and stertorous puffing of heavy brass. The stunning din and thumping elephantine pulse of the "Hailstone" and "But the waters" stood in contrast to the fine sonorous tone of "He spake the word," "He sent," and "He led them," and made one wish that the tubas and cornets at least might be done away with. As to the chorus "Calumny," from Alexander Balus, we marked it as the most effective and truly Handelian in its scoring of the day. We find that this was given as a test [illegible], that for once we heard a real score of Handel's without [illegible] retouching than an organ part by Mr. E. Prout, who at [illegible] may be trusted to [illegible] certain exceptions in the choruses, due to the fault we have mentioned, and not to any natural deficiency in the vocalists, the conductor, or the instrumentalists. It is a mark of a musical artist, in distinction to a mere organ of sound, to improve in his manner of reading long after his voice has reached maturity. This Mr. Edward Lloyd has done; he has added to his natural sweetness and his early-acquired smoothness a perfection of phrasing and a dignity of style which make him an excellent interpreter of Handel. "Comfort ye" and "Every valley" in the first division were given with great art, and the very difficult "Thou shalt break them" in the second part was done with more feeling for dramatic declamation than Mr. Lloyd has ever shown. His chief success, however, was obtained in "But Thou didst not leave" and the preceding recitatives, in which the purity of his voice and the suavity and breadth of his phrasing had a beautiful effect. Mr. Santley, with a diminished power of voice in one or two numbers, sang as only he can sing such music. No one else can make the long runs and tricks of style of Handel's day so full of point and meaning. As to the opportunities for grand declamation offered by these stately measures, no one, except Mme. Trebelli, can take advantage of them with anything like Mr. Santley's noble and yet polished vigour of manner. His rendering of "Why do the nations" was a triumph, and the summit of excellence reached on that day. We should not omit to mention Mr. McGrath's brilliant performance in the trumpet obbligato to Mr. Santley's last air. Mme. Albani did good service with her powerful voice and her strong and well-intended sentiment. Her delivery, however, was somewhat hard, and she showed an inclination to drag the time, weaken the feeling of measure, and break up the largo flow of the melody. Mme. Patey sang "But who may abide," without point or energy, and did little better in "O Thou that tellest." She improved, however, in "He shall feed" and "He was despised."

The chorus were steady in their parts, and, on the whole, sure in their attack. They deserve great praise for their clear and precise rendering of the network of fugal passages. The early numbers were sharply defined and massive; the difficult "He shall purify" being as little mechanical as could be expected from so large a choir. Just before "For unto us" the heavy brass instruments of torture were handed up into the orchestra, and with their appearance delicate enjoyment was at an end. After these vulgar blurts of brass the ear is tired, as the eye is after looking at the sun, and all seems tame and dull. The Handel tradition is truly incomprehensible. Considering the fine sonorous tone of the first half of "Glory to God," and the effect of the contrast of "Peace on earth," what could tempt any one to finish it, or such a beautiful piece of writing as "His yoke is easy," with the noise of a street band let loose in the place? The fuller volume and richer tone of choruses like "Behold the Lamb," "Surely," "And with His stripes," "Their sound is gone out," &c., in which the arranger has been more reticent, might show any one the havoc that has been wrought in others. With their fine quality one might compare the "Lift up your heads," and its accompaniment of brass buzzing like monster bees; the "Hallelujah" ruined as regards majesty and clearness, and turned into a chorus of trumpets, cornets, trombones, and tubas; and the noble and firm declamation of "Worthy is the Lamb," lost in the blurting staccato of a ponderous orchestration. What makes such treatment the more annoying is that the chorus, conducted with a fine precision, sang admirably, and required no drowning or unnecessary support at fugal points or elsewhere. Those in authority at the Festivals should try to dispel the idea that the study of Wagner has blunted us to all but the rawest effects. If Handel's music was played as he intended the reproach that musicians will not listen to it would soon be removed. Handelians would no longer be obliged to cater for religious emotionalists who can read anything into anything, or for the common honest lover of the big drum and cornet who welcomes the entry of the brass with a deep gasp of satisfaction.

ZUKERTORT.

FOR about twenty years—since the stars of Buckle, Morphy, and Anderssen set—the world has regarded Mr. Steinitz and Dr. Zukertort as dividing the chief honours of the game of chess. If it appears to some that the balance of merit between the two was never exactly struck, the doubt must remain unsolved. Amongst the men who have made a distinct profession of chess Dr. Zukertort enjoyed a high personal repute, being uniformly courteous, self-respecting, and worthy of confidence. His reputation as a player will probably tend to increase now that he is dead; for in the past few years, doubtless owing to physical causes, he had lost much of the brilliancy which distinguished him in his best days. In order to make a fair estimate of his position as a chess-player, it is necessary to bear in mind the facts which were spoken to by the doctor who attended his inquest. In addition to symptoms of ordinary constitutional weakness, it appeared that there were signs of decay at the base of the brain. It would be unsafe to conclude that excessive concentration on one monotonous pursuit was amongst the causes of this decay, of which there were other and adequate explanations. But the decay itself was quite enough to account for a certain falling-off in the quality of his achievements in the last three years; and it is possible that the strenuous effort, which was virtually successful, to retrieve his laurels in the tournament at the British Chess Club hastened the already inevitable collapse. It follows that Dr. Zukertort's niche in the history of chess must be decided by his record previous to his famous match with Mr. Steinitz in America, during which, after winning the first four games, he broke down altogether, and lost his form beyond recovery. It was about the year 1870 when the young German doctor settled in England; but, though his strength was recognized from the beginning, he did not gain a very significant victory before the International Tournament at Paris, in 1878, when, in the absence of Steinitz, he defeated all the other first-class players in Europe. He and Steinitz were forced into obtrusive rivalry by the zeal of their respective friends. A magnificent victory in the London Tournament of 1883 raised Zukertort to the acme of his fame. Most judges of chess—we do not say the best judges—fully believed him at this time to be the strongest player; but in 1885 the Austro-American turned the tables on him in the manner already described. Zukertort's combinations were never quite so strong as those of Steinitz; he had less hardihood, both of mind and of body, and a less thorough comprehension of his game whilst it was in progress. His great qualities were logical continuity, conciseness of idea, symmetry, and, in his best epoch, a brilliant conception of attack. In these respects he has had few equals, and his analysis was marked by a very extensive knowledge of the history of the game. We have undoubtedly lost in Dr. Zukertort an accomplished and excellent chess-player; but, comparing for a moment the condition of chess at the beginning and the end of his career, it is impossible not to be struck by the fact that the average player of 1888 is far and away in advance of the average player of 1870.

THE RISE IN FOREIGN BONDS.

TO the general surprise, the death of the Emperor Frederick has been followed by a rise instead of by a fall in foreign Government bonds. The Friday before the Emperor's death Russian Bonds of 1873 were quoted at 91¼, Spanish Four per Cents at 70½, Italians at 97¼, Hungarian Gold Rentes at 79⅝, Greek of 1884 at 72¼, and Egyptian Unified at 79¾. On Thursday last the prices of these several securities were as follows:—Russian, 97¾; Spanish, 72¼; Italian, 98; Hungarian, 82¾; Greek, 75¾; and Unified, 81⅞. In every case it will be seen there has been a very considerable advance. Considering all the circumstances of the case, this is not a little remarkable. For more than four years a great speculation for the rise has been going on in foreign Government bonds. During those four years there have been frequent political scares. First came the Penjdeh incident, and then the danger of war between Germany and France and between Germany and Austria on the one hand and Russia on the other. Each scare has seen a considerable fall in prices; but it has been followed by a rapid recovery, and now the death of the Emperor Frederick, which it was generally expected would give rise to fresh anxiety respecting the maintenance of peace, has been followed by the rise just shown. It is seldom so signal an illustration is given of the power of a great speculation to force up prices in the face of adverse circumstances. Bearing in mind the political condition of Europe, it seemed to most observers that prices were not only extravagantly high, but that they were as high as speculators could contrive to keep them, and yet they have been forced higher still. The finances of Russia, to take an example, are in a deplorable confusion. Every year ends with a deficit. The expenditure is constantly growing, while the revenue is stationary. Debt is being piled upon debt, and the concentration of troops in Poland, which has been going on for a year or a year and a half now, must have added enormously to the general expenditure. Yet Russian bonds are within a couple of pounds of par. Again, Hungarian Gold Rentes, which bear interest at 4 per cent., are about 80—that is to say, an investor in those bonds will receive about 5 per cent. for his money. But the finances of Hungary are in disorder like those of Russia, and besides it is to be recollected that Hungary has run up a debt of about 140 millions sterling in only twenty years. Lastly, Italians, which, allowing for the Income-tax, yield the investor only about 4¼ per cent., are practically at par. Taking into account the financial condition of these several countries, it will be admitted that the prices are high even if peace were assured; but, when we bear in mind the danger of war, the extravagance of the prices will at once be recognized.

The general causes which are raising the prices of all kinds of securities in every country of the world are well understood by our readers—the steady growth of wealth, the slowness with which new securities have been created of late years, the reduction of their debts by countries like the United Kingdom and the United States, the unwillingness of capitalists to invest in land in consequence of agricultural depression, and the steady investment of trust funds in the Government securities of each State. Apart from these general causes, there are, however, several temporary and local influences which during the past few years have been exercising an extraordinary power over the stock markets. Between 1850 and 1875 the industrial development of Europe was very rapid. In consequence, there were multitudes of new Companies formed and new loans negotiated, principally for industrial purposes. In consequence of all this, banking business was rapidly developed upon the Continent as well as in this country, and banks, especially on the Continent, acquired the habit of looking to new issues and to Stock Exchange business generally for the greater part of their profits. The banks in their early days found it necessary to join together in what came to be known as syndicates for the carrying out of the operations in which they were engaged. Industrial enterprise has unquestionably received a check since the Franco-German war; but the habits of the great Continental banks have continued. They have continued to operate upon the Stock Exchange for the purpose of increasing their profits, and this practice of the Continental banks has been further stimulated in Germany by the purchase of the Prussian railways by the Prussian Government. The field open to individual enterprise has been so much narrowed by the constant encroachments of the State that the great banks have looked to the bringing out of new issues and manipulations on the Stock Exchange more and more as a means of making profit. Add to all this that the bankers and capitalists generally of Berlin since the establishment of the Empire have desired more and more to make Berlin one of the great centres of banking and Stock Exchange business. The Berlin bankers undertook, therefore, somewhat more than four years ago to rehabilitate Russian credit, and for the purpose they set on foot a great speculation in Russian Government bonds. That speculation has continued, and has branched out in many other directions, and ever since Berlin has retained the lead in the speculation. There is no doubt that Germany has been more prosperous than most other countries of late. Particularly she has taken the lead in the manufacture of sugar, and the sugar industry has given her the means of speculating and of financing, of which her bankers have promptly availed themselves. When the speculation began somewhat more than four years ago, it was the hope of the great capitalists who took the lead that the general public would follow them, and that gradually the securities of all kinds which they bought up would be absorbed by investors. The political alarms to which we have referred above have defeated their expectations. There appears to be no doubt that for a long time past investors have not been buying upon the Continent in anything like the amount which the speculative traders had hoped, and consequently the great banks and chief capitalists and speculators of Berlin, Paris, Amsterdam, Vienna, and Rome hold immense masses of those securities at very high prices. When the death of the Emperor Frederick was seen to be imminent, everybody expected that a fall in prices would occur, because everybody believed that while he lived peace was assured. The great capitalists and speculators desired, if possible, to prevent this fall, and consequently "supported the market," as the phrase goes; in other words, they bought up such stocks as holders were desirous of selling in the event of the Emperor's death. The speculators for the fall, perceiving this, were afraid of being "cornered," and they ceased selling; and the result was that the buying of the great capitalists sent up prices. Their efforts were made the more easy because the supply of loanable capital in all the great markets of the world is very abundant. Money can be borrowed by persons in good credit on extremely favourable terms, and therefore it was by no means a difficult task for bankers and capitalists to take up prices one or two per cent. Add to all this that the expectation has become more general that peace will be maintained, at least for this year, and it will be seen that the task which the great capitalists had set themselves of supporting the market was greatly facilitated.

Still the position is becoming critical. It is always an easy thing for a combination of great capitalists to force up prices, and it is not difficult to keep them up for a considerable time; but speculation that began early in 1884 has now lasted, as we said above, more than four years, and that is an extremely long time to maintain artificial prices. That the great capitalists and speculators of Berlin have shown extraordinary skill in the manipulation of markets is certain, and that they dispose of vast capitals is likewise beyond question; but neither skill nor large capital can avail to maintain prices at an artificial height indefinitely. For a while the general public was led by the great bankers and capitalists to buy the stocks which they recommended; but the first blow to the great banks and speculators was struck when the Imperial Bank of Germany refused to lend money on the security of Russian bonds. For years previously the bankers and capitalists of Berlin had been recommending those bonds to their clients, and suddenly the greatest of the German banks, at the instigation of Prince Bismarck as was generally supposed, declared those bonds to be so risky that it would not in future accept them as security for loans. And the check which the great capitalists received in this was made still worse when the semi-official German papers began to expose the unsatisfactory state of Russian finance. Once the confidence of clients in their banking advisers is shaken, it is not easily restored, and of course when the clients begin to doubt the banks as regards Russian bonds, the doubts are likely to extend to many other kinds of securities. It appears to be beyond question that for a long time past the investment of money has fallen off upon the Continent, and consequently that the great banks and capitalists have been obliged to sustain markets by their own purchases. It is obvious that at some time or other this must come to an end. If peace were fully assured, it might go on, nevertheless, for a considerable time; but if the danger of war increases there may be another collapse, and a collapse that will extend to almost every Bourse upon the Continent. A great war would make inevitable borrowing upon a vast scale by the principal Continental nations. Therefore there would be a multiplication of securities, and prices from that alone must seriously fall. Moreover, the belligerent Governments look, in the first place to the leading bankers in their respective countries for the advances necessary to begin and carry on operations, and the bankers, to provide this money, would be obliged to get rid of some portion of the securities which they now hold merely speculatively. The instant, therefore, that bankers become convinced that war is imminent they will get rid of some of their speculative holdings at any cost; and when the rest of the world perceives that, every one will be eager to get rid of what he has bought. The fall, therefore, would be very great. Lastly, the outbreak of war would give rise to a great demand for matériel of war. Manufacturers would need large accommodation. The value of money would, for that reason amongst others, instantly rise, and this would be another reason for a considerable fall in Stock Exchange securities. It seems inevitable, therefore, that the first serious scare will bring about a great fall in the prices of foreign Government bonds.

[The Secretary of the Cape Copper Company writes to us, in reference to a statement in the Saturday Review of June 23, to the effect that the Bankers' guarantee extends not for one year, but over "the whole period of the three years' contract," in the case of his Company, adding that the same arrangement is well known to exist in other cases.]

MR. CHARLES HALLÉ'S RECITALS.

THE series of concerts of chamber music given by Mr. Charles Hallé this season are, as usual, of great interest to musicians. It is to lovers of music, to those who know the history and follow the movement of the art, that Mr. Hallé appeals. Thus, among the names of masters who are classics, we find in Mr. Hallé's programme contemporary composers, recognized indeed on the Continent, yet but imperfectly known to the English musical public. Dvořák, though it is true his works are well appreciated here, is represented by a novelty of exceptional interest—his first numbered composition, the Quintet in A. Tshaïkowski, a composer whose popularity in London concert-rooms increases with every opportunity of hearing, supplies another novelty, important of its kind, a characteristic Trio in A Minor. Another interesting concerted piece was an unpublished Intermezzo in E, by Stephen Heller, for pianoforte, violin, and violoncello, given at the concert of Friday week by Mr. Hallé, Mme. Norman-Neruda, and Herr Franz Neruda. Thus Mr. Hallé cannot be said to neglect the current and proper demand for novelties. At the same time amateurs who find enough of variety in Beethoven, Schumann, and Brahms, cannot but be grateful to Mr. Hallé for the judicious and eminently interesting character of the music introduced by him. With programmes so attractive and executants so brilliant as Mr. Hallé's colleagues—Mme. Norman-Neruda, Herr L. Ries, Herr L. Strauss, Herr Franz Neruda—it would be matter for wonder if these concerts lost anything of their peculiar distinction. It is only right to add that another distinction belongs to Mr. Hallé, in that he, of all the musicians in England, first of late years introduced the Damnation de Faust of Berlioz to the English and London public, and that his masterly rendering of the score, if rivalled, has never been surpassed.

THE CAPTURE OF HAWARDEN WILLIE.

(A newly-discovered Border Ballad.)

O HAVE ye na heard of the bauld Watkin
  And his borings under the silver streak?
And how he ha' nobbled auld Hawarden Willie
  In Parliament House for him to speak?

"O what will ye gie me, auld Hawarden Willie?
  O what will ye gie to the bauld Watkin,
Gif he rats frae his party and votes na mair
  To comfort and keep the fause Tories in?"

"O gif ye'll do that for me, Watkin my man,
  I'll sell ye the rags of my statesman's fame;
And I'll gie ye my vote for your Tunnel plan
  But and a speech to support the same."

Then the good Sir Edward laughed fu' loud,
  And he winkit the lid of his leerin' e'e,
"But what will ye say to the Tory crowd
  When they taunt ye with changin' your mind?"
    quo' he.

"They'll bid ye remember the vote ye gied
  In the Eighty-five and the Eighty-four;
And what will ye say when they ask ye why
  Ye gie not against me that vote once more?"

"Now haud ye your clack!" quo' Hawarden Willie,
  "Now haud ye your clack, Sir Edward," he cried,
"'Tis little, I trow, is the good ye ha' got
  Of the days and the years ye ha' sat by my side.

"O think ye a vote is a collar of airn,
Or a fetter of steel about my wrist?
O think ye a word is a pebble-stane
That I canna swallow it when I list?

"Fu' mony a word stands now to my name
And mony, fu' mony a Parliament vote,
But ne'er knew I vote that I could na 'explain,'
Or the word that would na gae down my throat."

And Hawarden Willie has hied him hame,
And shut himself up, twa hours ago,
Alane with a volume of gay Hansard,
But and a file of the Times also.

And Willie has gane to the Parliament House,
To the Parliament House, and has entered in,
To vote for the plan of the Channel Tunnel,
To speak for the Bill of the bauld Watkin.

And syne he told how he killed the Bill
In the Eighty-four and the Eighty-five,
And syne he "explained" how in Eighty and eight
He was a' for keeping the Bill alive.

And he talked till the Parliament House was hung
With the saft grey mirk of a mental fog;
And it's O! but the clapper of Willie's tongue
Wad talk off the hind, hind leg of a dog.

Sae Willie has worked with the bauld Watkin
That the land of Britain to France be tied,
And sae with Willie will Watkin work
To break her bonds on the Irish side.

But Hawarden Willie and bauld Watkin
Will wait, I trow, for a lang, lang day,
If Watkin waits for to hae his will Till Hawarden Willie has won his way.

DON QUIXOTE.*

WE shall not inquire whether a new translation of Don Quixote was called for. Mr. Watts has supplied a thoroughly satisfactory answer to any such question in advance. He says in his preface that out of the love he bears the Don and the Don's creator he has been at work on them for eighteen years. Also he says, and we can believe him, that he is not satisfied with any previous translation. Now as long as men continue to enjoy Don Quixote there will be some who are constrained by nature to translate him. As, further, no gentleman ever is satisfied with another gentleman's translation, we have any of us two good quarrels to do yet another version. For the rest, the desocupado lector is at home in his own house, and should be master thereof, as the king is of his taxes, which exempts and frees him from all respect and obligation. He may speak as he pleases, and surely neither he nor the critic need complain if they are asked to read Don Quixote again. As Mr. Watts has not yet published all his translation, but only as much of it as takes us to the adventure in the Sierra Morena, it is perhaps early to speak of its merits as a whole. Moreover, since no one is ever quite satisfied with another's version, it is somewhat idle work examining the turn of every phrase. It would be easy to go through Mr. Watts's version and ask him, Why did you use this word, and why that? Is "claps a bandage on his eyes" (to begin at the first page) the exact equivalent of "le pone una venda en los ojos"? Does not the English lean a little to the slangy and familiar where the Spanish does not? If we were required to describe the young women who were "del partido," we should prefer to say that they were free-lances, and not "of the game." But of such differences of opinion there would be no end. Enough that Mr. Watts gives the meaning of his author without swerving a jot from the truth. To ask that he should give us the exact English equivalent of the prose of Cervantes would be to look for pears from the elm-tree. The languages are too radically different to allow of the rendering of what is most national in one into the other. And who shall say that he has entered into the soul of Miguel de Cervantes, and read the heart of his mystery? Fielding might have done it if he had known Castilian as he did human nature. Thackeray might have done it if his Spanish had been as good as his French. They had a kindred and an equal genius. We do not expect any Cervantista to agree with this assertion; but those whose literary Goshen is less circumscribed will acknowledge it to be true. From lesser men we cannot ask for an equivalent, but only for an approximation. We must needs apply Pope's admirable dictum concerning models. This is not said to vilipend Mr. Watts, nor yet Mr. Ormsby or Mr. Duffield. An approximation to so great a thing is itself much. Perhaps the moral of all talk about translations of Don Quixote, as Sainte-Beuve, who said the good things of all critics before them, has pointed out, was given us long ago by that solemn practical joker Harley. This Minister, according to the story, advised Prior to learn Spanish. The poet diplomatist took the advice, in the hope that something nice in the form of a place would be the reward of his labour. He was inexpressibly disgusted when Harley complimented him on having acquired the power to read Don Quixote in the original.

Mr. Watts brings out his translation with a very complete "apparatus criticus." At the beginning he very properly puts a life of his author, which fills the first volume. He also adds appendices and notes. Among the former we are glad to see an account of the famous Paso Honroso, the great tournament held at the bridge of Orbigo by Suero de Quiñones—of which there is extant "a Bell's Life" report, bound up with the chronicle of Alvaro de Luna. The Paso Honroso is useful beside Don Quixote, though the best thing of all would be to take it with the Seguro de Tordesillas. The two together make up a medallion of the fifteenth century, with its face of brilliant valour and ostentatious passion and honour, and its reverse of boundless cruelty, greed, and falsity. A life of Cervantes is still more welcome. We have no good one—not even one founded on Navarrete, and since his day something has been discovered. Mr. Watts gives all the known facts, and it is needless to say writes of his hero with very proper admiration and sympathy for him. As far as we have to differ with Mr. Watts it is, however, because this sympathy is too apt to stop with Don Miguel. Where Mr. Watts has to paint in the background of his portrait he shows certain dislikes which vitiate the values of his work—to adapt a useful word from the language of art criticism. Of the Monarchy and the Church of the sixteenth century he takes the orthodox constitutional Protestant view—we will not say Liberal, because from indications here and there we doubt whether Mr. Watts would thank us for the adjective. He dislikes the despotism of Philip II. and the Church heartily; and, without denying that Cervantes was a good subject and good Churchman, is a little inclined to consider him as standing apart from and as the victim of his time. It seems a hard saying to him that the country which produced so good a man as Cervantes should also have produced naturally and inevitably the despotic King and the persecuting Church. In truth, this despotism in Spain—and we might, remembering Henry VIII., say as much for England and all the Continent—was a nearly unmixed blessing to the mass of the population. The liberty it put a stop to was the liberty to fight Wars of the Roses; the liberty of Burgos to exercise rights of pit and gallows over its neighbour; of La Cerda and Guzman to fight their deadly feuds out in the streets of Seville. The King became master because he was the only central authority, the only recognized Court of Appeal in the midst of anarchy and mutually hostile privileges. The Spanish Monarchy developed as others did. If it ended in universal darkness, the reason must be sought in some mysterious cause in the Spanish character. Despotism did not ossify the intelligence of France, or Germany, or England. As much may be said for the Church which also grew with Spain and withered with it. There is no reason to suppose, as Mr. Watts indeed acknowledges in general terms, that Cervantes was other than perfectly loyal to Church and State. Still Mr. Watts's wish to separate his hero as much as possible from the evil thing is visible, and once it leads him into one of those pieces of over-ingenious interpretation of which Cervantes has so often been the victim. In a note to the famous scene of the auto de fé on the Don's books Mr. Watts gives it as his opinion that there are hits at the Inquisition subtly concealed therein. We may be obtuse, but viva Roque we cannot see them. Cervantes thought that the priest and the barber, good fellows both, were well employed in burning the trash. If we are to argue from the scene to his opinion of the Inquisition we must conclude that he thought it did excellent well in burning heretics—which, indeed, is our opinion. The Church has never objected to the use of ecclesiastical terms by laymen unless there is open disrespect, which there is not in this case. The licensers might well see nothing to object to in the passage.

In the view which Mr. Watts takes of the events of Cervantes's life it is possible to differ from him without being prepared to say that he is wrong. Personal feeling goes for much in the question. There will always be people who, because they love Cervantes and his great work, will be indignant to think that he strove with sorrows all his life and died in poverty. The feeling is natural and commendable. It is akin to the indignation aroused by the misfortunes of a friend, which is apt to be extreme, and unjust to others. On the other hand, some who are quite as hearty admirers of Cervantes and of Don Quixote may be disinclined to share in this wrath. They will say something like this:—It is true that Cervantes lived with no recognition till he was fifty-eight, but then he had done nothing in literature until that age, except a dull pastoral and a few unsuccessful efforts in uncongenial lines. His countrymen are not to be blamed for not being prophets. True, he had fought gallantly and been wounded on service. So had many a valiant gentleman of Spain, who did not suffer the less because he wrote no Don Quixote. He had been a slave in Algiers, and was poor. It was the lot of others. The place given him was but humble; but the King had many to provide for, and among hundreds of competitors why should he have been particularly favourable to Cervantes? His uncongenial work brought Cervantes further suffering, but his official chiefs could only judge him by the work he did for them, and, like some other men of genius, he did not shine in dull matters of business

* The Ingenious Gentleman, Don Quixote of La Mancha. By Miguel de Cervantes Saavedra. A New Edition, done into English, with Notes, Original and Selected, and a New Life of the Author, by H. E. Watts. 5 vols. Vols. I. and II. London: Bernard Quaritch. 1888.

When his great book appeared, it did not bring him a competence; but, alas! he lived in an age in which copyrights were not lucrative—and here, again, he shared the common lot. He bore his misfortunes nobly—and so much the better for him; but the wheels of this world, which grind terribly small, take no heed of the difference between the hero and the coward. There is one event to the righteous and to the wicked—the difference between them is the way they meet it. Let us not blame others for what was in the nature of things. Mr. Watts takes the first and the more emotional view, and we say again that we find no fault with him for it. What we do object to is a tendency on his part to belittle his hero, strange as it may seem. Again and again we are asked to notice that here and there and in the other place there is a slap at Lope de Vega. Once it comes in the use of the Latin word "felix" in a quotation. Well, for our part, we are sorry to hear it. We had thought Don Miguel more magnanimous than to gird at his luckier brother of the quill in these small ways. It looks as if he too had shared the common and mean Spanish vice of envy. Of course, if Mr. Watts is right, Cervantes had no cause to complain when other men fell foul of him. Gentlemen who play at bowls must look out for rubbers. But is it true? We doubt it. Cervantes was lavish in praise, far too much so for his critical reputation, and was, we really think, too brave a man to mention Lope by name with a proper regard for his real worth—which in literature was not small—as he does, and then attack him underhand. The temptation to discuss other problems of Cervantes's life with Mr. Watts is great, but limitations of time and space are peremptory. Mr. Watts has told English readers more about it than they will obtain from anybody else in their own language, and he will assuredly mislead nobody who reads him, as he would naturally wish to be read, with some critical faculty.

FICTION.*

In descriptions of quiet rural life few writers could compete with Mr. Thomas Hardy. We do not say that his work is invariably faultless; but we do say that, when taken up at all, every word of it should be read, if it is to be either enjoyed or judged of fairly. The Wessex Tales consist of five stories of events which are supposed to have taken place in the earlier part of the present century. And now we are going to find a fault. Why does Mr. Hardy place two stories connected with executions next each other? Why, in two stories out of five, does he begin with unexpected guests at humble festivities, in humble homes, on humid evenings? Why, again, in a proportionate number of his five tales does he clear the way between married people and others whom they wish to marry by killing their unloved mates? And having done this, why does he in both instances disappoint the bereaved ones of their hoped-for second marriages? Mr. Ruskin tells us that one of the great laws of composition is the law of repetition. Mr. Thomas Hardy obeys this law so implicitly in these volumes as to approach the monotonous. We say approach it only, for there is quite sufficient variety in them to afford pleasant reading. The first of the tales, "The Three Strangers," is a crisp, original little story enough, and well told. "The Withered Arm," which follows it, is a disagreeable, ghastly tale, and we could wish it out of the book altogether, although it is undoubtedly clever and enriched with some excellent descriptions. In number three, "The Fellow Townsmen," again both characters and scenes are admirably described. We can hardly believe, however, that on returning to Port-Bredy, after an interval of twenty-one years, the hero could have found Mr. Watkins, the bookseller, so ignorant of the affairs of his own native town and its surroundings as he is here represented. "Interlopers at The Knap," the fourth story, is somewhat pointless; but, like all the others, it is embellished with powerful description, and we would rather read it than many a thrilling novel. The last tale, "The Distracted Preacher," is, in our opinion, the best of them all. We have no fault to find with the plot, and the account of smugglers' life on the coast is interesting, lively, and picturesque.

We confess that we took up A Glorious Gallop with a groan. Of so many glorious gallops had we read that we felt inclined to say "And yet another?" Well, it is another, but not of the conventional type. Far from flying over impossible fences and unjumpable brooks in his stride, the horse which carries the heroine in this particular gallop is afflicted with incipient cataract in both eyes, and blunders in the most alarming manner at every fence. When we have said that he pulls so hard that his rider has not the least control over him, it may be imagined that this gallop is not an unmixed pleasure to the heroine; and as he breaks three of her ribs and his own neck at the end of it, even its glories are somewhat shorn. The gallop, however, only occupies seven of the hundred and eighteen pages. The hero of the story is intended by a managing mamma to marry the prettiest of her five daughters; but instead of doing this he marries the ugliest. It is a simple little tale, well told, and it ought to add to the popularity of the writer. A Glorious Gallop is not all horses and hunting. Unpretentious as it is, it contains a good deal of pathos, and shows that the author has not a little knowledge of human nature.

In All Else of No Avail we are expected to take an interest in a hero who "borrows" from his employer's till to pay his debts, and promises to marry an actress for a consideration of 300*l*. It should be added that she was, to his own knowledge, a thief on no small scale. While he was engaged to this delectable personage he stayed at a country house where he met and fell in love with another young lady. With her he went to a cottage where a poor man was dying. The invalid asked him to pray, so "he braced himself up, and in a few plain simple words said briefly what he thought the old man would wish, and which in reality was at the same time his own prayer. A surprise to himself, he did not hesitate for words, but said exactly what came to his mind, firmly and earnestly." The old man died a few minutes later, and then the hero rewarded himself for praying so beautifully by kissing the young lady in whose company he had performed his devotions, and whose hand he had held during his orisons. "Enraptured and intoxicated their lips met." "He drew himself back and looked at her, and then clasped her still closer to him, and kissed her lips again," feeling "that he stood upon a pinnacle which overlooked the universe." It is needless to say that the lady to whom he was betrothed very soon brought him down from this pinnacle. As might have been expected, complications ensued, and he found himself in an awkward predicament. This calm philosopher then made the best of circumstances. He told lady No. 2 that he loved her but could not marry her; and he told No. 1 that he would marry her but could not love her. No. 1 then took a shot at him with a revolver but missed him, and shortly afterwards poisoned herself. This would have cleared the way for a marriage with No. 2 had not the latter excused herself on the ground that she had once been bitten by a mad dog, and might go mad at any moment. Here was another complication, and the parties agreed to refer the matter for arbitration. The decision, accompanied by another prayer, was in favour of an immediate marriage. After their wedding the dread of hydrophobia haunted them until they were nearly distracted. Happily an artist friend was found to possess the very dog that had bitten the heroine, a "brown hound"—whoever saw a brown hound?—and this brown hound proved, after all, to be clothed and in his right mind; whereupon the hero "leaped up and seized the artist's hand and shook it fit to wring it off." "Great sobs, long pent up, burst themselves from him," and he and his wife were happy ever afterwards. Stolen diamonds, two defalcations, two burglaries, the robbing of a letter-bag, several detective policemen, a shipwreck, a fatal accident over the Falls of Niagara, a suicide, and two cases of attempted murder (to say nothing of the brown hound and the hydrophobia) are found necessary to "lend an interest" to this simple story. The tremendous plot narrowly escapes success; but it reminds us of a large yet damp firework, as it is not nearly so effective as its size would lead one to expect. The considerate author, anxious, apparently, to spare his readers anything like a shock, breaks his surprises gently to them, and prepares them gradually for their joys and sorrows. The effects of music upon the hero were so remarkable as to be worth recording. On a certain afternoon he happened to stroll into a village church when a young lady was practising on the organ. And this is what happened. He "leaped to his feet and clutched the rail of the pew. He felt as if a huge hand with a grip like a vice of steel had seized him and was bearing him upwards and along towards the booming music. He stared at the blackness in front where the organ was, as if he every minute expected it to open, and he should see through the widening doors a place all alight and filled with myriads of glowing, winged figures as far as the eye could reach, and he seemed to see himself, one black spot, going through those doors into that brilliant hall." Then came a "rhythmic crash," and "higher and higher he seemed to be taken in that colossal grip, his senses all strung to the utmost tension." At last, "a couple of bars from the end, the fearful music stopped, the hand seemed to release him, and down and down he fell through space, silently without a scream" (mark that!)—"silently without a scream he plunged like a weight through the darkness; he would be dashed to atoms at the bottom." But no! Suddenly "he seemed to be caught and his fall suspended." One of the leading characters in this novel is a certain Uncle Bat, a hospitable fellow, who writes to ask his nephew to "pack up a toothbrush and clean collar and come down for a week." He was an excellent billiard-player "and spent a good bit of time knocking the balls about, and practising artful, impossible hits." He was fond of playing with his guests, "giving starts to a good many who thought themselves dabs at the game." Among the pleasant little peculiarities of diction affected by the author are "Alright," "to look and see," "did not want to," "whatever has become of me," "the twelve of them," and such passages as the following:—"His arms must have ached fit to drop off. 'Some one has cut up a lot,' said the lady, 'but they've cut it so thick, &c.'" The italics are ours. Possibly we have said enough to give an idea both of the story and the style of All Else of No Avail. After reading it we asked ourselves this question. If this sort of thing is accepted and printed by publishers, what must the novels be like which they refuse? for we are told that there are such, and many of them, difficult as it is to believe it.

Mary Jane Married, a sequel to Mr. Sims's former work, is a better book than its title would lead one to expect. Mary

* Wessex Tales. By Thomas Hardy. 2 vols. London: Macmillan & Co. 1888.

A Glorious Gallop. By Mrs. Edward Kennard. London: White & Co. 1888.

All Else of No Avail. By Ben Hayward. 3 vols. London: Hurst & Blackett. 1888.

Mary Jane Married: Tales of a Village Inn. By George R. Sims. London: Chatto & Windus. 1888.

Jane is a servant who has married and settled down with her husband at a pretty country inn. In each of her chapters she describes one of the visitors who patronize her little "hotel," as she loves to call it, or one of the barmaids, billiard-markers, &c., connected with it. The net result is a succession of more or less unconnected stories, each one chapter long. A book of three hundred pages, made up of such stories, has its disadvantages for continuous reading. It has something in common with a reprint of tales from a magazine, which, as everybody knows, has a tendency to be wearisome. An unambitious little work of this kind ought not to be criticized too severely; and we may honestly say that we have found in it a fair amount of variety, some not ill-drawn sketches of life and character, considerable originality, and a few bright touches of humour. It is not exactly the sort of book that we should read for our own personal gratification, but we think that there are many people who might enjoy a little of it, and some who might like the whole of it. An inclination to tediousness and an occasional want of point are perhaps its greatest faults. The second title is, in our opinion, a better and more explanatory one than the first, and we should have advised the author to have reversed them, calling the book "Tales of a Village Inn; or, Mary Jane Married."

THE THRONE OF THE FISHERMAN.*

WE took up Mr. Allies's book with a good deal of interest; it is perhaps as well to say at once that we read it with increasing disappointment. Had it been, as its somewhat rhetorical title would seem to hint, a mere exhortation, a mere "preaching to the converted," in plan, we should have felt less interest and no disappointment at all. Indeed, we should have contented ourselves with a few words of decent mention of it. But the heading of the first chapter, "The Continuous Witness of History through Eighteen Centuries to the See of St. Peter," and the apparent purpose of the author in his first pages to live up to this heading, seemed to promise something like a true eirenicon, for which the time is by no means unapt. The See of St. Peter (a term which we use "with all rights reserved") is at present occupied by a pontiff who unites the general respect of Christendom after a fashion which we must go back generations to equal, or indeed to approach. The old asperity between "Catholic" and "Protestant" is, except in the most ignorant and fanatical persons of at least the Anglican side, at a lower ebb than has been the case ever since the Blessed (or otherwise) Reformation. Men of intelligence, here and there, recognize that to wage wars of patricians and plebeians when the Gaul is at the gates, when the question is not of one kind of Christianity against another, but of Christianity against non-Christianity, is, putting moral, and even religious, views aside, a gross blunder. No one acquainted with history and possessed of some logical faculty is, so far as we know, very sanguine of actual reunion; but we might at least think that some attempt was going to be made from the other side, an attempt perhaps doomed to failure, like all previous attempts, but at any rate one recognizing the necessity of common ground. Such common ground, to a certain extent, history does provide. Non-Roman even more than Roman Christians have of late years shown victoriously how important, how indispensable an influence the Papacy was in the shaping and the maintenance of the civilized polity of Europe. Non-Roman even more than Roman Christians have taken pains to show the baseless folly of the notion that the Reformers "in a loomp" were angels or apostles, and of the attempt to deny that the motives of the Reformation were in many cases of the vilest character. Here, it might be thought by the guileless, even by the guileful, who retain so much innocence as to believe in titles, was to be such an attempt "from the other side." An argument based merely on tradition or authority no non-Roman could of course accept, however willing he might be to grant that, if the tradition were universal or the authority universally accepted, the matter would be different. But history is history; and no man holding the position of those opponents of Roman Catholicism who call themselves, as they believe with the best possible warrant, Catholics, thinks of disputing the jurisdiction of that court. He grants, like his adversaries, that history cannot touch the supernatural side of the question; he is certainly as willing as they are to recognize its finality in regard to the natural side. This being so, a very little surprise might have been generated in such a reader as we are supposing—one who knows the historic facts, and at the same time accepts the authority of the Scriptures, of the really Œcumenical Councils, and of the traditions of the Universal Church—by observing the somewhat sweeping "eighteen centuries" of Mr. Allies's first chapter. To do Mr. Allies justice, he does not keep his reader long upon the tenterhooks. It seems that he has no new facts to bring nor even any new arguments to contribute as to the first three centuries. We are to jump certainly to the Council of Nicæa—apparently to the Council of Chalcedon, and to take for granted that a very dubious recognition of papal authority in the beginning of the fourth century, a more certain recognition of it in the middle of the fifth, at once sum up and prove the conclusions on the subject of the first, second, and third centuries. Now this, we own, is a little cold-waterish to our desire to "hear some argument." For, in the first place, if you may argue the consent of eighteen centuries and more by proving the consent, not by any means unanimous, of fourteen centuries and less, we do not quite see why you should give yourself the trouble to go back to Chalcedon. "Why need there five-and-twenty, ten, or five?" The Lateran will do to start from as summing up the consent of a dozen centuries, or the Tridentine as summing up the consent of sixteen, or why not save all trouble and start from 1870, pointing out that, as the Vatican Council represents and sums up the consent of the Church before it, that will do? For we need hardly say that it is just exactly this crux of the first three centuries that has got to be solved. And you cannot solve it by starting as if there were none. The eye of faith, of Roman faith, of course needs no proof. But we thought we were dealing not with faith but with history.

But this is not all. We cannot turn a page without seeing that Mr. Allies's notion of "history" is something absolutely different from ours. Assuming for a moment that the evidence showing that St. Peter was actually Bishop of Rome, and that he formally transmitted not merely episcopal but super-episcopal authority to his successors, is as certain as the evidence showing that Christ was crucified at Jerusalem, would it not, in a chapter where history is so ostentatiously cited, be just as well to quote the authorities which supply this evidence, their date and their words?—as well as for the delegation of patriarchal powers by St. Peter to St. Mark at Alexandria and for the assertion that, though St. Peter "held the see of Antioch for seven years" before he went to Rome, the sees are not only "coeval" (both these statements are made textually by Mr. Allies), but Rome is "the first see"? Again, Mr. Allies duly quotes at length the remarkable passage of St. Gregory the Great in which the triunity of the see of Peter—Antioch-Rome-Alexandria—and the derivation of the three patriarchates therefrom is recognized. He also tells us that Alexandria and Antioch "disappear" apparently under Divine ordinance for the greater glory of Rome. But he seems to have very partially seen one, and altogether to have missed another, serious aporia and something more than aporia which follows from these statements of his and of St. Gregory's. If, as the saint states with the utmost clearness, there was in Antioch and Alexandria as well as in Rome the Cathedra Petri, the see upon which "by divine authority three bishops now preside," how is it that one is to be regarded as having from the first been more than primus inter pares? This is the first; the second is much worse. The triple see, Antioch-Alexandria-Rome, is, says St. Gregory, the Cathedra Petri, the rock against which the gates of hell shall not prevail. According to Mr. Allies the gates of hell prevailed against two-thirds of it before a third part of the eighteen hundred years were over. Is not this a little awkward?

We trust that we shall be regarded as incapable—we, at any rate, make the most solemn assurance to Mr. Allies and all whom it may concern that we are incapable—of dealing with this question otherwise than dialectically, and on the grounds of history and logic only, the two grounds on which, we suppose, Mr. Allies wishes it to be discussed, inasmuch as otherwise his historical arguments seem to be altogether superfluous. We could subscribe with clear consciences, perhaps with consciences rather clearer than those of persons who accept the Vatican Council—the declaration on his sixth page, "I speak to those who believe." And we are equally safe from a later negative definition of "those who believe in no Church." But if Mr. Allies appeals to history and to reasoning, to reasoning and to history he shall go. And we are bound to say that, up to the Council of Chalcedon at least, his historical arguments are worth nothing. For they are not only subject to the formidable dilemmas which we have indicated above, but they also repose on no documentary evidence, and in the absence of documentary evidence they rest on a succession of unconscious petitiones principii. The Church of Rome was preserved when the Churches of Antioch and Alexandria fell because it was the See of Peter; and the Church of Rome is the See of Peter because it was preserved when the Sees of Antioch and Alexandria fell. The Councils acknowledged it because it was the constant tradition of the Church; and it was the constant tradition of the Church because the Councils acknowledged it. The shuttlecock goes backwards and forwards in this way continually, and it is a very pretty game, but not history nor logic. Mr. Allies does, indeed, refer to St. Clement, but it is noteworthy that he does not quote the passage at length, and he lays little stress on it.

With the opposite theory to his own, though he sometimes glances at parts of it, and shows that he is aware of its existence, he never deals fully. And especially he never attempts to meet the argument that this opposition theory explains the facts, the facts admitted by faith as well as the facts proved by history, not only as well as his own but a great deal better. That the very fact of the recognition by the early Church—a recognition crystallized once for all in his own unlucky quotation of St. Gregory as to the threefold representation of the Petrine rock in Asia, Africa, and Europe—is fatal to the absolute primacy of either see; that such primacy inter pares, as can be inferred rather than proved as having existed early, is a natural consequence of the fact of Rome being the unquestioned capital of the Christian world; that it ceased when Rome ceased to be such a capital; that the so-called heresies of the Greek Church are in no sound theological sense more heresies than the novelties decreed eighteen years ago at Rome; that the fissure, not of the Church which never can be divided even by its own faults, but of the political state of the Church, necessarily followed the further political division of Christendom; and that nothing can be held of universal authority except what was universally decreed:—these are the main propositions to which non-Roman Catholics pin their Catholicity. And the validity of them remains absolutely untouched by Mr. Allies's argument, while we mean nothing impolite when we say that it cannot be touched by his history, because his history is for the most part non-existent. The very word history must be an empty name to a man who can talk of the "uninterrupted testimony of the history of eighteen centuries," and then say, that you must certainly take the first three of the eighteen for granted, if not the first four and a half. And we fear we must add that logic must mean as little to a man who quotes the "text of constitution" as to the gates of hell, the "text of definition" given by St. Gregory, and the fact of the obliteration of the Antiochian and Alexandrine sees, as if the three together did not, on his principles, constitute a chain ruinous either to the inspiration of Scripture, the orthodoxy of St. Gregory, or the truth of that very undeniable and certain history which tells how the patriarchates of Alexandria and Antioch became the prey of the infidel.

THE GIPSY LANGUAGE.*

IT is a healthy sign that the number of "monarchs retired from business" is at present being rapidly equalled by those who are going into the business of literature. And we may place very prominently among the latter that genial gentleman and earnest scholar the Archduke Jósef of Hungary, who, if not literally a monarch, acts practically as one in Buda-Pest, in absentia regis. That he is glad to meet every stranger of note or culture, that he is as devoted to the chase as to books, and that he can even talk to all of his subjects in their twelve or fourteen languages, are facts which will probably be enumerated to the tourist by the hotel-keeper soon after his arrival in the city of the Huns; for the people are very proud indeed of their Duke, and rejoice in him after a good, old-fashioned, simple-hearted wise, such as is now becoming rare in the world.

Among the marvels related of his Highness, who has done a great deal of the romantic Haroun al Raschid wandering in his time, there is one to the effect that he has more than once passed months as a gipsy of the gipsies in tents among the wild Romany. That he speaks perfectly the half-dozen gipsy dialects of Austro-Hungary and Germany is proved by the book before us, entitled "Czigány Nyelvtan, irta Jósef Föherczeg, Budapest, 1888"—"The Gipsy Tongue, by Josef the Archduke"—in which a copious vocabulary and grammar of these forms are compared with the Indian languages on a scale and with a thoroughness which has never before been applied to the Romany of any country. By the Indian languages we mean here Sanskrit, Prakrit, Hindustani, Bengali, Sindi, Mahratta, Kashmirian, Malabar, and Tamil. And, to judge the author according to what he simply professes to have attempted to do, it must be admitted that the work is well done. It exhibits great industry guided by common sense, and it is free from any attempt to force facts into any far-reaching theory, which is the ignis fatuus which too generally misleads the greatest philologists. It is far superior to the great Thesaurus or Die Zigeuner in Europa und Asien of Pott, because the writer has not only a clearer style and simpler method, but because he has a more extensive and very much more familiar acquaintance with his subject. Pott in the pride of his book-learning actually boasted that he had never seen a gipsy more than two or three times in his life, while Archduke Josef, though he makes no mention of it in his book, can, on hearing a sentence, decide whether the speaker is a musician of the city, a wanderer of the roads, or one in transition between these social conditions.

If the Czigány Nyelvtan is not perfect as regards comparison with Oriental sources, it is due to the fact that as yet no one has mastered the mysterious Bhât or jargon of the roads, which is current among certain classes of gipsies who wander not only through Northern India but also Persia and even Syria, and which contains much of the corrupt slang of those countries. Among these there is one—apparently an offshoot from the common Dom or mountain Domar—whose members call themselves Rom or Romani, and whose language seems to be identical with that of Syrian gipsies proper. The late Professor E. H. Palmer, from his knowledge of English Romany, found it easy to converse with the latter. While the standard dictionaries of Indian languages make clear the origin of the great majority of European Romany words, it is evident that the last word of the enigma can never be perfectly solved until we have vocabularies of all these Indian jargons. But as we have not as yet mastered all the low dialects even of Great Britain, it is evident that we may have to wait for some time for those of India, notwithstanding the great and creditable efforts which are being made by Major Grierson to collect them. In this connexion we may state as a fact, which will interest many scholars, that we gather from a MS. dictionary, which was the result of many years' careful search, that the English-Romany dialect contains hundreds of words of Indian origin, mostly Hindi or Persian, which do not appear in any of the vocabularies of the Continental dialects. George Borrow, who declared that there are only twelve hundred words in English gipsy, had a very limited knowledge of its extent.

The second portion of the work, which is a full quarto, of 377 pages, is devoted to a very carefully written account of the works or papers which have been published relating to gipsies. As this part includes not only novels and tales, but even such operas as Preziosa, Il Trovatore, Balfe's Bohemian Girl, and Carmen, it cannot be said that effort has not been made to perfect it. It is true that several of the earlier and even later English writers on gipsy-lore are not mentioned. We do not observe the names of Crabbe, Hoyle, George Smith, Wilson, or any reference to an American book of 1863, The Gipsies, or the English versions of Grellman; and an index is, moreover, greatly to be desired; but such omissions are pardonable in a first edition of such a work, since, as regards all that is given as to Continental works on the subject, even the most learned "Tsiganologues" will probably learn much that is new. Take it for all in all, we may say that the best offspring of gipsy learning is its last.

It will gratify those who are interested in the subject to know that French and German versions of this, the Hungarian original, will soon appear. As regards paper and typography the book is all that can be desired. A propos of it, we may mention that a Gipsy-lore Society has very recently been established, which, as its title indicates, is to be devoted to investigating and collecting the language and legends of the Romany. It is to be hoped that supporters will not be wanting to so interesting a scheme.

THE World's Verdict is a pleasantly written and promising story, showing some signs of the 'prentice hand in the inequality of its construction and in the air of second-rate melodrama which surrounds its more serious characters and situations. It is probable that where Mr. Mark Hopkins has succeeded best he has given us the results of his experience, and that it is where he has relied on his imagination that he has failed. With the Hardings, the American family travelling in Europe, and their Irish maid Nora, our author is on safe ground; he is dealing with types he has met and understands. He is also thoroughly successful with his two pairs of lovers, and may be specially complimented on the character of the young Russian artist Serge Tolotski, whose enthusiasm for art is most happily free from priggishness. Mr. Hopkins's style is neat and pithy, and without being brilliant is bright and amusing. Take for instance the following:—

> When Mrs. Harding saw an antique treasure in the shape of old silver or embroidery, or even a copper pot, she said first, "It's lovely"; next, "I wish I had it"; next, "I can't afford it"; and finished with buying it.

And, again:—

> Mrs. Harding and Mrs. Gordon were congenial spirits who mutually disapproved of each other sufficiently to make occasional interviews necessary and interesting. "An incorrigible gossip and a vulgar woman," said Mrs. Harding in the bosom of her family. "A pushing thing and, I believe, a hypocrite," said Mrs. Gordon in the bosom of hers.

Unfortunately, in introducing the element of evil which for a time threatens the happiness of the young lovers the author is at his worst. The characters of the wicked Russian Prince Turgeoff and his accomplice and ex-valet Pietroff are conventional and artificial; and the episodes in which they figure have the air of being made to order to produce the required effect, and therefore fail to carry with them any conviction of reality. It is impossible to believe in the astute old intriguer Pietroff deceiving himself as to the fortune of a not particularly attractive young woman, and marrying her on her own unsupported assurance that she has money. Such mistakes show Mr. Hopkins to be a novice in the art of novel-writing; if experience mends these shortcomings, without robbing his style of its freshness, he should do well.

If we accept the title of Lady Watkin Williams's novel as correctly describing its contents, and hold that Even Such is Life as she therein depicts it, we shall have no difficulty in answering Mr. Mallock's familiar inquiry with an unhesitating and cheerful negative. The characters, one and all, hold with the walrus in Mr. Lewis Carroll's delightful story-book that "the time has come to talk of many things," and the reader is accordingly entertained with a succession of discourses on politics in general and Mr. Gladstone in particular, on whether domestic servants should be compelled to go to church, on "the amount of intelligence which dictates the votes of the masses," on "the quarrel between the Church and free thought," and so forth. There is no plot, the characters are so busy talking that they have no time to act; indeed, so lightly does the author regard the fortunes of her dramatis personæ, that towards the end of the third volume she despatches to the West Coast of Africa her hero (if a story which is all about nothing can be said to have a hero), a Radical Welsh Baronet, whom she represents as a paragon of all virtues—personal, domestic, and political—and then, after dwelling on the dangers of the climate and the possibility that the voyage may prove fatal to him, she brings her book to an abrupt termination without any further reference to him. The reader can scarcely be expected to feel interest in a story on the construction of which the author has expended so little care. There is more human interest about old Lord and Lady Hendon than about any one else in the book, and the old banker's struggles, his temporary failure, and ultimate success, are told in a way that encourages hopes that Lady Watkin Williams may yet write a readable novel, if she will realize the fact that mere talk on extraneous topics, however exalted they may be, does not constitute a work of fiction. There is one passage in this book which is open to the gravest objection; that in which Mr. Gladstone is mentioned by name—the introduction into the pages of a novel of the names of contemporary personages of eminence is much to be deprecated as an offence against all the rules of good taste; which in the present instance is aggravated by the extremely personal nature of the reference. If novel-writers are encouraged to make free with the names of living statesmen, they may soon begin to introduce them among their characters, and of such a new departure who could say what would be the end?

MEMOIRS OF BARON DE RIMINI.*

If these Memoirs are genuine, and the shamelessness and spite that they exhibit incline us to believe them to be so, the writer of them was or is—for it is doubtful whether he is still alive—a rascal of no ordinary kind. Griscelli, or the Baron de Rimini, as he calls himself, was—we prefer to believe that he is dead—a Corsican of low birth, who quarrelled with his first wife, and entered the French army in order to rid himself of her. While in that service he became, so he tells us, a splendid swordsman and a noted duellist, and on one occasion ran his sword through three fencing-masters, taking them one after another, and crying as the third fell "Now for another! Here's the butcher!" His first wife having died, he married again as soon as he was discharged, quarrelled with his second wife, and apparently married a certain Louise; for he was, he says, "sold" to the Commissary of Police, and was imprisoned for two years for bigamy. Meanwhile Louise died, after giving birth to a son, whom he left to be maintai ed by the family of his victim. Soon after the coup d'état he became a secret agent of the police, and had special charge of the person of Napoleon. By his own showing he was mixed up in some vile affairs, and assassinated at least one man for his master, and another, whom he stabbed in London, on his own account. After his patron Pietri lost his place as Prefect of the Police, Griscelli was dismissed, and in 1859 was hired by Cavour to promote the organization of revolutionary Committees, and served various masters in Italy as "agent" or spy. During the time that he was employed in Rome as a spy by Cavour, he also acted as a spy for Pius IX.; and, while receiving pay from the Pope and Cardinal Antonelli for secret service, sent reports of all he did to Turin. Among his exploits at Rome he got up a demonstration to "celebrate St. Joseph's, Garibaldi's, and Mazzini's birthdays," in order to enable Antonelli to detect the members of the revolutionary Committee—a bit of villainy which, he declares, was sanctioned by the Ministers of the King, and for which he was paid 600 francs when the men he had betrayed were arrested. While still in the employment of Cavour he hired himself to Francis II., King of Naples, was engaged by the Count of Trapani to assassinate Garibaldi, and betrayed the plot and the two assassins who were associated with him to the Piedmontese Ambassador. After Cavour's death he worked as a pamphleteer for the Papal party, stayed for some time at the house of Cardinal Wiseman, and received the title of Baron de Rimini from the ex-King of Naples. Then he did some jobs for Victor Emmanuel, and shortly afterwards was employed as a spy in the Austrian interest in Venetia and Florence. He disappeared, so his editor informs us, in 1867, his career probably being brought to some appropriate end, and left behind him these Memoirs, which remind us of the sulphurous stench that is supposed to infect the air after the disappearance of a more distinguished deceiver.

The first part of this volume, which relates Griscelli's experiences while serving as a secret agent of the French police, contains a large number of unpleasant stories; the second part is mainly concerned with political intrigues of the baser sort. It is not our purpose to enter on the writer's reminiscences of his life in Paris under Napoleon III.; they present a disgusting picture of chicanery, vice, suspicion, and violence. Many of them are utterly dull; some are no doubt more or less true; others are evidently mere repetitions of vulgar tattle. Any one who chooses to read this most unsavoury book must of course bear in mind that it is the production of a professional liar, who does not attempt to conceal his feelings of malice and revenge. An examination of one or two of his statements about his experiences in Italy will show what amount of credit ought to be given to his Memoirs generally. It will be observed that the editor, who conceals his name, has done his work with extreme carelessness. After a ludicrous description of Farini when Dictator of the Æmilian provinces as a "creature who faltered at no deed which might prove to Europe that Francis IV. [V.] had governed his subjects like a tyrant," Griscelli declares that he heard the Dictator give orders that Colonel Auviti [Anviti] should be "given up to the populace." In reality, Anviti, the agent of the tyranny of Charles III., was recognized at the railway-station at Parma when proceeding in custody to Piacenza, and was with some difficulty removed to the police-barracks. The mob forced its way into the barracks, overpowered the police, and murdered him. Farini issued a strongly-worded proclamation condemning the "hideous crime," and ordered a general disarmament of the citizens. A notice is given of the landing of Garibaldi at "Marseilles" [Marsala], and Griscelli goes on to say that the Neapolitan force at Catalafimi [Calatafimi] merely "pretended to resist him." As a matter of fact, some two hundred of Garibaldi's men were put hors de combat, his son Menotti being one of the wounded. The chapter ends with the remark, "We will leave Sicily, pillaged and sacked by the Dictator's hordes." The last chapter of the volume presents the conduct of the Archduke Albert previous to the battle of Custozza in a new light. After a description of the positions of the four Italian Army Corps, we are told that the Archduke "was staying quietly in his palace at Verona, contenting himself with gathering around the city about forty thousand men." He is represented as remaining in this careless and inactive state until the day before the battle, 23rd June, when he asked this ex-police-agent of Napoleon III. "to go to the Mincio, towards Vallegio, and find out what the Italians were doing." The "Baron" discovered that the enemy was crossing the river, though he remarks, "with a single battery of artillery the Austrians could have prevented their passage," only of course the Archduke, who was staying quietly in his palace, neglected to send the battery. "Some," he observes, "said that the Archduke preferred waiting under the walls of Verona that he might whip them more easily. Others affirmed that his Highness Prince Albert was waiting to be attacked on the Po." However this might be, the "Baron" returned with his news, and so, the reader is given to understand, enabled the Austrian commander to make arrangements that led to the victory of the following day, though, as it happens, the Archduke had ordered his army to concentrate on Verona the day before. Now we do not pretend to say what the "Baron" did or did not do, and, as it is certain that on the 23rd a reconnoissance from head-quarters reported the Italians in force near Vallegio, it is perfectly possible that, though a civilian, he was allowed to ride with the reconnoitring party. But what will strike every one who knows anything about the matter is, that the "Baron" was either utterly ignorant of the true state of affairs, or chose to conceal it from his readers to enhance his own importance. From the very beginning of the month the Archduke was convinced that the Italians would attempt the passage, and, as his army was far smaller than theirs, he knew that his only hope of success lay in preventing the junction of the King and Cialdini on the Adige. By taking up his position at Verona he hoped to be able to cut them off from each other, and whether the King crossed the Mincio to protect the march of Cialdini from this position on the Lower Po, or Cialdini began by crossing the Po in order to draw off the Austrians, and so enable the main army to pass both the Mincio and the Adige, in either case to fall unexpectedly on the King's army before it could be joined by the force under Cialdini, and thus defeat the enemy in divisions. The success of this masterly scheme entirely depended on his watchfulness. Accordingly, far from remaining content with gathering troops, he adopted probably the completest system of outposts ever known. These outposts effectually concealed his movements from the enemy, and at the same time brought him constant and complete information as to every movement on the part of the Italians. His plan of operations and the extraordinary skill which enabled him with a far inferior force to surprise and rout the Italian divisions are admirably described in General Clery's Minor Tactics, where the position and movements of the Austrian outposts are taken as a leading example "of outpost duty efficiently performed, and of the extreme importance that may attach to it." If the "Baron" had told us anything of all this, his reconnoitring adventure would have scarcely appeared to have contributed so largely to the success of the Austrians as the unwary reader will probably be led to suppose by his "entirely military chapter" on the battle of Custozza.

THE LAW RELATING TO DOGS.*

Mr. Lupton in his preface expresses a hope that his book will prove useful both to the profession and the general public; and, as the general public are owners of dogs almost to a man, the information that it contains, given as it is in a clear, concise, and practical way, technical expressions, as the author says, being as far as possible avoided, is of the utmost value. It is only surprising that no such work has appeared before. For the purpose of the book dogs are conveniently classed under four distinct heads—(1) ferocious, (2) dangerous, (3) mischievous, (4) harmless—and every dog is regarded as harmless in the eye of the law until the contrary has been proved. Most of the legislation relating to dogs has been the work of the reign of her present Majesty, and the wisdom of the Legislature has provided that cattle and sheep (including horses) are in a more favoured position in relation to dogs than human beings. The human being, if injured by a dog, must prove a scienter against the owner; he must prove that the owner knew, or ought to have known, the savage propensities of his dog, if he seek compensation for the damage done to him personally; whilst, in the case of cattle, &c., such proof is not required. The fact is, many harmless and well-disposed dogs, if temptation falls in their way, will yield to the impulse of the moment, and it is wonderful how small a dog will seriously injure and kill sheep. Sheep are the natural food of the dog, and it is a triumph of art, a notable example of the variation of animals under domestication, to have brought him to be their chief protector. Sheep, moreover, are very delicate, and will die of a small bite inflicted when they are excited by fright.

The first five chapters of the book are devoted to the law protecting man against the dog, and the sixth, seventh, and eighth to the law protecting the dog and his owner against man. Chapter III., on the statutes relating to dangerous dogs, treats of the law concerning rabies, the most terrible of all the dangers that we run in our intimate association with dogs. There has been a well-founded alarm of late excited by the prevalence of rabies, probably by no means alleviated by the experiments of M. Pasteur, which have called attention to facts before not generally known, and have dissipated an ignorance that ought never to be bliss. The amending Act 49 & 50 Vict. c. 32 made the law more severe and more easily put in motion, and thousands of dogs, more especially in London, innocent and guilty alike, fell victims to the rabies scare. The innocent may be lamented, but the sacrifice was necessary, and not too great. The sentimental picture—"Nobody's Dog"—which appeared on the walls of the Royal Academy some few years ago feelingly represented one of these poor abandoned innocents, a type of the many who were executed according to law. Chapter IV. treats of trespassing and sporting, and of what a dog may and may not do by way of sport. W. Knox Wigram, in his Justice's Note-book, says:—"It is remarkable that 'hawk and hound,' those inseparable companions in the country life of our ancestors, should have been regarded with such widely different favour by the founders of the Common Law. To steal a reclaimed hawk has been felony from unrecorded time; while, until no very remote period, the owner of a stolen dog was left to the tame and expensive consolation of a civil action." In p. 59 of Mr. Lupton's book a note refers to the curious "forestal law relating to dogs, and the right to hamble and expeditate them." To expeditate a dog is the reverse of expediting him. The forester had a right to cut out his claw or the ball of his foot to prevent his chasing deer. Mr. Lupton says:—"It was formerly considered, and so held in several cases, that a person might justify hunting over the grounds of another, provided the governing motive was the extirpation of vermin, and not merely the pleasure of a run, and that he did no more than was necessary to kill the fox, otter, or other object of the chase." It is curious that the case quoted in support of this opinion is Nicholas v. Badger, in which Badger was the defendant, as he too often is. The fox has now been raised from the ranks of vermin, and has become a sort of semi-sacred beast in the eyes of the squire, and being no longer vermin, hounds commit a trespass if they pursue him upon the land of a person against his will. The landowner is, however, always assumed to be innocent of objecting to fox-hunting over his land until he has been proved to be guilty, and in this instance the law protects the guilty person. Dogs can be a nuisance, but the result of some cases "can scarcely be deemed satisfactory." Whether a dog may or may not bark and howl all night, disturbing the sleep of some and the studies of others, is not definitely decided. In London it has been held by magistrates to be and not to be a nuisance. The cock-crowing so irritating to Carlyle, superseded afterwards by the railway-whistle, according to Mrs. Carlyle, are instances. Decidedly no dogs could rival a railway in the nuisance of noise; but, as railways are not dogs, that is neither here nor there. In rural districts, it appears, a dog may make as much noise as he pleases, even if he interrupt the pursuits of a scientific gentleman who has erected a laboratory at great expense—Pearson, J. Huddlestone v. Boare.

The statutes for the prevention of cruelty to animals protect the dog, as he most woefully required protection. The dog is beloved of man, and returns his love with ardour; but the cruelty of man has also been lavished on the dog, next in profusion perhaps to his own race, the dog's intimacy and sympathy with man having given him a capacity to excite the human passions. When the Act, popularly known as Martin's Act, was passed 3 Geo. IV., Mr. Martin, an Irish country gentleman, in urging Parliament to pass it, gave such sickening descriptions of cruelties practised upon dogs that members could not sit in their places, and many were obliged to leave the House. The Act to amend the law relating to cruelty to animals, 39, 40 Vict. c. 77, constitutes the law regulating vivisection, in which dogs and cats are specially mentioned, and Mr. Lupton gives this Act in full in an appendix. He also gives in full the Act 28, 29 Vict. c. 60, to render owners of dogs liable for injuries to cattle and sheep; and the Act 34, 35 Vict. c. 56, to provide further protection against dogs—these three Acts being recent and very important additions to the law. Chapter X., and last, treats of proceedings in Courts of summary jurisdiction, in which most of the cases where dogs are to blame are heard before justices of the peace or stipendiary magistrates.

This is a handy, well-designed book, and can be recommended highly to all owners of dogs. There is a table of cases, an excellent index, and three important Acts printed in full. There is nothing but praise to be given to a small volume, excellently printed, and not burdened with an unnecessary word.

LIFE OF DR. WORDSWORTH.*

AMONG the numerous biographies which swell the literature of the present day it would be impossible that a life of the late Bishop of Lincoln should not find a place. Eminent as he was in ability, and by the various important positions he filled, he was perhaps more remarkable still for belonging to a type which is becoming rarer, as the lives of men become busier—that of the profound and polished scholar, combined with the practical and dignified Churchman. The nephew of William Wordsworth, and son of the Master of Trinity, brought up at Winchester, and having his home at Cambridge even before he became a member of the University, he lived in an atmosphere of culture and learning from his earliest years, and he and his brothers were endowed with just the natural gifts to make the most of these advantages. Probably never before or since did three brothers, all within the space of five years, carry off so many University honours and prizes as the Wordsworths did between 1825 and 1830. Learned as he afterwards became in patristic theology, this study never obliterated in him his love for the pursuits of his early life, and the classics were his delight and relaxation to the last. At Harrow he inculcated in his sermons that "there is no better preparation for the study of Christian morality than the thoughtful and wisely directed study of such writers as Horace, Juvenal, and Aristophanes"; and he practised what he preached. Theocritus is, however, the poet who is specially identified with his name, and the following statement by the present Archbishop of Canterbury, referring to a period when Bishop Wordsworth was seventy years old, is worth quotation:—

I was once sitting with the late Master of Trinity (Dr. Thompson) when he was speaking with great admiration of the Bishop's genius for scholarship. "A pity," he said, "that he took to divinity; he would have been the first scholar in Europe. Even now he is the only one almost of living men whom the Germans appreciate." He then went on to say that he had been re-reading Theocritus just lately with the utmost care, and "possessed myself of all the latest German editions up to this moment, and read them. Why, they are all made out of or based on Wordsworth's notes and texts which he published when he was quite young! It was a wonderful thing." When I next saw the Bishop I told him that the Master had said he had been re-reading his edition of Theocritus with great pleasure, and found the Germans so largely indebted to it, and that they had not gone beyond it. The Bishop smiled with a look of great amusement, and, with his eyes brightening, he said, "Did he say so? Did he really tell you that about the later editions? I know a good deal more about Theocritus now than I did then"; and with a smile he passed off to some other subject. The very next summer holidays which he had he looked up his accumulating notes, and brought out the beautiful new edition, which really was a great advance even on his own old one, with its exquisitely written Latin preface. It was the work, I believe, of a very few weeks, and by no means the only work.

After taking his degree and travelling for a time in Italy and Greece, the impressions of which he afterwards published in what still remains a standard work, Christopher Wordsworth became Classical Lecturer at Trinity; he was then ordained priest, made Public Orator, and in the same year Head-master of Harrow. This was the only unsuccessful epoch of his life, and it is not easy from the somewhat cursory way it is touched upon in the memoir to gather the reason. No doubt he set to work energetically in the path of reform, which our public schools at that period stood sadly in need of, and reforms are never popular either with masters or boys. They may also have been carried out with some want of tact and forbearance, as is hinted at; but there was so much in him of manliness and sympathy with boyish pursuits that it is difficult to see how he could have become permanently unpopular with the boys, and upon the masters his energy and uprightness must have told in the end. Probably had he stayed on he would have reaped the fruits of his labours instead of his successor; but, as it was, the offer of a Canonry of Westminster by Sir Robert Peel in 1844 was a welcome relief. His career as a prominent Churchman here begins, and so mixed up was he in all those efforts which have done so much to revivify the National Church, that more than the mere mention of them is beyond the scope of our short notice. It is true that, if the National Church was to continue to exist as such, it was a necessity that its organization should be extended; but to Christopher Wordsworth more than to any other man is due the fact that it was extended upon ancient principles, and not by new methods which would have had to be amended almost as soon as they were made. It was said of him that he was a primitive Christian dropped into the nineteenth century, and that was precisely what the Church of England wanted at the time. He felt as a Churchman what he afterwards expressed when he became a bishop; that he was not only a diocesan bishop of the national Church of England, but that he also belonged to the hierarchy of the Church Catholic. It was this feeling which prompted him to extend his warm instincts of fraternity to the dignitaries of the Greek Church on their visits to England, and to which we owe much of the friendly feeling of the Eastern Church at the present day; hence also arose his support of the Old Catholic movement, and his personal visits and speeches which animated their Conferences. On the other hand, the exclusive claims of the Church of Rome to be the Church Universal awoke his righteous wrath, and no more spirited protest than his Responsio Anglicana was ever put forth against the Infallible dogma of 1870. At home the Church of England owes to him in a greater or less degree the revival of Convocation, the restoration of Synods, Diocesan Conferences, the Pan-Anglican Synods, the renewal of Suffragan Bishoprics, and the extension of the Episcopate—any one of which would have conferred fame upon any man. As regards suffragan bishops, his treatment of the question was so characteristic of Dr. Wordsworth that it must be mentioned separately. It had been talked about for years; the necessity was acknowledged, but there the matter rested. Bishop Wordsworth simply did it.

* Christopher Wordsworth, Bishop of Lincoln, 1805–1885. By John Henry Overton and Elizabeth Wordsworth. London: Rivingtons. 1888.

In the very first year of his consecration as Bishop of Lincoln (1869) he prayed that he might have the assistance of a bishop suffragan, according to the ancient use of this realm before and after the Reformation. There was no real obstacle, as the statute of Henry VIII. was still unrepealed; and on February 2, 1870, a suffragan bishop of Nottingham was consecrated, the first of a long series. Before his death Bishop Wordsworth had carried his other great point, and his unwieldy diocese was divided by the consecration of the Bishop of Southwell.

As regards his opinions upon many subjects, it would have been interesting if they had been set forth a little more at length by the compilers of the memoir before us. They are to be found, of course, in the Bishop's published writings; but a few words or a short extract would have spared references almost as frequent as "Are they not written in the book of Jasher?" and, like that oft-quoted work, the special volume is not always to hand. His view of the Total Abstinence question is instructive:—

You will pardon me, I hope, for saying that it is very difficult to say who are "total abstainers"; some who are so nominally are not really. Besides, some who abstain from fermented liquors are remarkable for excess in eating and smoking. My travels in Greece brought me in contact with Turks who called themselves total abstainers, but were notorious for surfeiting and other licentiousness. I fear that many of our "Good Templars" would be found to be "bad Turks."

Nevertheless he recommended the Church of England Temperance Society, because "it did not enforce total abstinence on any, as a term of association with itself, and did not venture to condemn as evil any of God's creatures." No consideration of the unpopularity of any cause he thought right prevented him from lifting his voice in its favour; he deemed it his duty to protest against the appointments of Dean Stanley and Bishop Temple, but without a trace of rancour, and he remained firm friends with them to the end. He was energetic in his opposition to the Public Worship Regulation Act, though promoted by the two Archbishops, and in 1880 he fought almost alone, in the House of Lords, a hopeless battle against the Burials Bill on behalf of the vast majority of the clergy. He was of the stuff of which martyrs are made. "My dear friend," he said to the present Primate in 1870, when talking over the gloomy condition of the Church, "you have this great comfort before you, that probably you may be enabled to live to be a martyr." The Archbishop adds, "I believe that is the thing that he would himself have enjoyed more than anything else"; but he does not state how he relished the forecast of his own future.

LIFE AND TIMES OF QUEEN VICTORIA.*

THE second and concluding volume of Mr. Robert Wilson's chronicle of Her Majesty's reign is a record of the last nine-and-twenty years, 1858-87, a period of well-defined phases of depression and activity in our history, when political crisis at home was frequent and unusually acute. The commendation we were able to pronounce on Mr. Wilson's first volume cannot be withheld from this. Considering the comprehensive plan of a work designed for general reading, skill and discretion are visible in many directions where the latter quality was eminently desirable, though by no means to be anticipated with confidence. The history of our own times, for instance, can scarcely receive dispassionate treatment from the pen of the politician, who, if he should not incur the charge of partisanship, is almost certain to view things from a party standpoint. There is nothing of the inflexible politician in Mr. Wilson's comments on political movements and party tactics. Now and again dissent from his conclusions is unavoidable, but in such instances we are under no obligation to impugn the independence or the bona fides of the chronicler. It is open to any one to regard his judgment of Palmerstonian foreign policy as somewhat lacking in inclusiveness of vision. Patriotism in a statesman is a quality that ought not to be susceptible of any misconception to a candid mind, though it is notoriously apt to be somewhat elusive to contemporaries. The patriotism of Lord Palmerston ought at this date to be measurable enough. But Mr. Wilson hardly, we think, recognizes its true weight and value in Lord Palmerston. Again, it is perhaps a little excessive to look upon Lord Derby's resignation of office in 1878 as a saving grace worthy of the gratitude of the nation. It is doubtful if that act saved the country from war with Russia; it is still more doubtful if that war, which Mr. Wilson thinks was inevitable as well as threatened, would have proved the "direst calamity" to England. Then, again, the decisive election of 1880, which reinstated Mr. Gladstone, may, or may not, have proved that "the electors were more afraid of Lord Beaconsfield's foreign policy than of Mr. Gladstone's Irish Nationalist sympathies"; but it was incumbent upon Mr. Wilson to produce evidence of, and to define, Mr. Gladstone's Irish Nationalism in 1880, in order to justify his rejection of the more obvious conclusion that the majority of the electorate were influenced by the popular sentiment aroused by the Bulgarian agitation, and the crusade against the unspeakable Turk. These points, however, remain open matters to the open mind of the general reader, and, on the whole, Mr. Wilson's work shows creditable freedom from parti pris and a welcome individuality of tone. Excellent use is made of the literature of the period and official documents; and, with few exceptions, authorities are diligently referred to in notes when cited in the text. Events of domestic or social interest are properly dealt with prominently and with greater fulness than political history, while the woodcuts illustrative of the course of Her Majesty's life and her active interest in national progress are extremely well chosen, and for the most part well executed.

SPORTS AND RECREATIONS.*

MR. GALE'S new book might have a better name, but it could hardly be a better book in its way. The author delights in the style of "The Old Buffer," though there be buffers much more venerable extant; but his whole sympathy is with youth, courage, honesty, cricket, and English manliness. "The Old Buffer" is not merely the friend of times past. He laments the excesses of Mr. Arch, and the present condition of politics; but then he admits that, fifty years ago, the condition of England was very bad indeed. Rick-burning, shooting, hanging, gaol fever—these are old English institutions not regretted by Mr. Gale. He does lament the decline of village cricket, but surely this is the affair of the squires, farmers, and parsons. If they will read and learn from Mr. Gale, they will resist that dandified country cricket, which is not half such fun as the old village game, in which they should take their share in their parish. Centralization and swagger are the cause of this mischief. If England could be saved by village cricket, things would look a great deal more rosy than they appear at present. Of boxing Mr. Gale is a judicious friend. In an admirable essay on Tom Spring, he draws a full-length sketch of a respectable boxer, and censures Dickens's "Chicken," who, of course, is a mere diverting caricature. But Mr. Gale admits that the Ring is dead, and not to be revived nor regretted. He acknowledges that there is plenty of good boxing still with the gloves, and with the gloves you may still obtain the refreshment known to Mr. Gale as "a bellyful." Perhaps few modern amateurs are like the gentleman who backed a fighter and lost, through an upper-cut delivered by the opponent. That upper-cut so delighted the backer of the loser that it quite consoled him, and he "wished he had had it himself." Tom Spring told Mr. Gale what his sensations were when he fought. No one need be surprised that he did not feel blows when his blood was up; in battle, when sharper strokes are going, they are not felt, or are felt as mere touches, by men in hot blood. About real battles, about Quatre Bras and Waterloo, Mr. Gale has collected the memories of a veteran. Our men, or the men of that regiment at least, had no rations between the evening of June 15 and the end of the fight. A stray bit of biscuit was all they got to comfort them; but "the horses had a glorious time of it, as they ate as much standing corn as they pleased everywhere." Near Genappe the 1st Life Guards broke the French Lancers, who were mostly drunk, as they had sacked the liquor stores. We extract a few notes of the old soldier's:—

"Well, to go on to the Battle of Waterloo. We were on the Mont St. Jean side of Hougoumont on the morning, but we had been mostly on patrol duty and picket at night, as there were so few light cavalry, and the Belgians did not do what was expected of them, and we had to snatch a bit of sleep and get a bit of bread and biscuit and a drop of spirits as we could. The first shot, which reached us on the 18th, was a round shot, and I can see her now; my next man was a tailor, and a good soldier too, and he laughed and said, 'What do you think of that, Jim?' but the next shot took Sergeant Haslop's horse and thigh, and I asked him, 'What do you think of that, then?' As you know we did our bit that day, protecting the guns and supporting the first line, and when we made the last charge my horse was shot under me, and I caught a French horse and charged with the 18th Hussars, having lost my regiment, and we rested for that night near Belle Alliance, on the position the French held in the morning; and we got our first real meal early on the 19th. We afterwards moved on to Cambray and saw the reduction of the town, and then our fighting was over, and we marched on to Paris."

The narrator, Mr. James Simmons, was in the 7th Hussars.

Mr. Gale has plenty to say about schools. "Masters of large schools have now run up the costs as high as possible . . . and I think head-masters' conferences would be more valuable if paterfamilias had his hearing at them." Mr. Gale, in fact, though he has met good schoolmasters, does not seem very much to revere their wisdom. Nay, rather to hold Sir Walter Scott's opinion of that. The head-masters keep out "manly backward boys who want teaching," and who made our best officers, Mr. Gale thinks. And he is very hard on that competitive pot-hunting which, in the race for scholarships as well as for athletic prizes, harms the life of schools so much:—

One word about the big idle fellows. Hear what General Shute, V.C., an ardent Wykehamite, said at the Wykehamist dinner some few years back in the presence of Wardens, Masters, Judges, and Bishops. The general was returning thanks for the army, and claimed Winchester as his first teacher in military matters, as he was there grounded in punctuality, discipline, and obedience; and he added, almost in these words: "And if you would think less of the competitive examinations for the army, and let us have your strong, idle football-players and cricketers who cannot learn much Latin and Greek, and send them to us at seventeen years old, any good colonel or adjutant will either make good soldiers of them in twelve months, or return them on your hands, Queen's hard bargains."

Mr. Gale is not only fond of sport, but of every honest sport that is open to all men. Not merely dandy racing, dandy cricket, exquisite angling with the dry fly have their champion in him; but he describes with equal relish the lowly capture of roach and dace, and the matches where a peaceable umpire avoids offence by never giving any one out. He misses even the rat-hunting, he misses the simple times when there was less talk of distress, and we drank more cider and less champagne. But he has no bitterness in his regrets, he does not despair of England and her people, nor need anybody despair if Mr. Gale's works were acted on as text-books. There would be more fun, less display, more sport, and much less gambling. This is the sort of volume that one would wish to see in every parish library and on the shelf in every schoolboy's study. It is full of delightful anecdotes, and is a model of everything good, except, perhaps, of style, which is unimportant.

OLIVER CROMWELL.*

MR. JOHN MORLEY, like a wise editor, has made no more attempt in his "English Statesmen" than in his "English Men of Letters" to impose a single mould or model on his contributors, and the results usually justify the policy of "giving them their head." Certainly that policy is justified in the present instance. Mr. Frederic Harrison's work is often wrongheaded, and still more often narrow-sighted; but it generally has distinction and literary quality. The writer, moreover, is here very well parted with a subject, owing to his possessing what may be called a "cross-bench mind" in reference to ordinary English politics. It is still very hard for a thoroughgoing Tory to do justice to Cromwell; it is not much easier for a thoroughgoing Liberal, who cannot forgive "Take away that bauble" and the Major-Generals, even to the inventor of the celebrated receipt for governing kings by garring them ken that they had a lith in their necks; while a person of the good old illogical Whig persuasion is equally weighted on the other side. Now, whatever harm the "French pedant" has done Mr. Harrison, it has not been the harm of making him a blind adherent of any of these sects. If he is in any respect politically "cracked" (we mean no incivility), the cracks run in directions not identical with the general cleavage of English politics; while the great-man aspect of the Humanity craze must dispose him to look favourably upon a person to whom many have denied the title of good, but to whom no one in his senses would refuse that of great. One thing, we own, does surprise us in Mr. Harrison's book. We can find no mention—and if there were any adequate mention we could hardly have failed to find it—of the work of Thomas Carlyle. Now, putting all questions of estimate of the literary value of that work aside, it is a fact not admitting of discussion that neither Mr. Harrison nor any one else can handle this subject without being indebted at every step to Carlyle for the provision and the arrangement of the most indispensable materials.

In almost every other respect Mr. Harrison's work is unexceptionable, and as a narrative it is of unusual excellence. Whether by casting it so decidedly in the narrative form Mr. Harrison wished to make it more generally acceptable to general readers; or whether, with something of the cunning of the serpent, he saw that in a much-debated life it is the easiest and safest plan to shun debate almost or altogether, we know not. But he has refrained almost entirely from "arguing the point" on the most disputed incidents of the Protector's life; and he has refrained, as it seems to us, still more pointedly from giving any formal summary or discussion of his character and career. This, as we have more than once remarked, in reviewing books of the same kind, seems to us a mistake; but we must suppose it in the case of a writer like Mr. Harrison to be a deliberate mistake. However this may be, it distinctly curtails the reviewer's power of dealing at length with the book, inasmuch as there is nothing to fight about. Everybody (except, perhaps, some unusually logical Gladstonians) will admit with Mr. Harrison that Oliver's foreign policy was the foreign policy of a great patriotic Englishman; very few people will object to Mr. Harrison's putting aside the old theory of constant and conscious hypocrisy. He says as little as he can about the points which are not, like these, points of pretty general agreement; and yet in only one instance, we think, can he be distinctly said to "shirk." This instance is the instance of the Self-denying Ordinance, where, indeed, the most ardent Cromwellian must find it difficult to reconcile his hero's conduct with common honesty. Something might perhaps be said about the exceedingly mild view which Mr. Harrison takes of the sheer tyranny of the Major-Generals; but his book is, on the whole, so studiously non-controversial that it is hardly worth while to say it. Some incidental digressions and aperçus deserve favourable notice. Such is the elaborate demonstration that what won the Civil War was not Right or Might (in the general sense), or fervour of conviction, or popular determination, or anything of that sort, but simple military discipline—that the side which first got its regiments properly drilled and its army properly regimented won. Such, again, and more novel, is the insistence on the fact that Charles was by no means the incompetent tyrant of Macaulayan imagination, but a ruler, a negotiator, and even to some extent a general of great ability, his ability being to no small extent the cause of his death, because it made him formidable. Such, yet again, is the reminder that what Cromwell in his quarrels with the Rump and his own pseudo-Parliaments was aiming at was something not wholly unlike the separation of Executive and Legislature which has, hitherto with a kind of success, been carried out in the American Constitution. But it may be repeated that the merit of the book lies in the fulness, fluency, and (on the whole) fairness of its narrative of facts, and that this merit is very considerable.

THE BOOK OF NOODLES.*

WHEN people ceased to regard idiots ("soft-headed ones," the Zulus call them) as inspired, they began to look on them as unconscious humourists. Mr. Clouston's pretty little Book of Noodles is a compendium of stories about the Wise Men of Gotham in all countries. Noodle stories are found by Mr. Clouston in the Buddhist Jâtakas, or "Birth Stories," and every one has been acquainted with the "Scholasticus" in the Greek Delectus. The Fabliaux also have anecdotes of noodles, especially of the noodle who can entertain but one idea at a time. Such a one is found in the traditions of two neighbouring South Sea Islands, on one of which the women only are tattooed, while the men alone are tattooed on the other. In the latter tattooing was not fashionable, and the local idiot was despatched for instructions to the island where tattooing prevailed. There he was told "Tattoo the women and not the men." He made for home, repeating "Tattoo the women but not the men"; but he tripped on a tree-root, his memory was shaken, and when he arrived among his people he said, "Tattoo the men but not the women." This noodle appears to have escaped Mr. Clouston's researches, also the Ananzi version of the punning story like "Nobody did it," and all the exploits of that heroic noodle Tangarva the Fool, of the Solomon Islands, who brought death into the world, and all our woe. Mr. Clouston begins with the Greek simpletons of Hierocles, the man who, having a house to sell, carried about a brick as a specimen, and our other friends, who were very ancient Joe Millers, no doubt, when Hierocles collected them. If the Margites, attributed to Homer, had not been lost, we might have found, in the Margites, the epic of heroic noodledom. In Greece, as in modern Europe, people of various places—Cumæ, Abdera, and others—had a reputation as Gothamites, a reputation probably given by their next-door neighbours. The Irishman of fable is, perhaps, only a hero created by the jealousy of England, and "bulls" may be one of the injuries which it is so difficult, alas! to redress. The exclamation of the old woman, the victim of a pedlar, "and his name was Stout," is as familiar to Persian as to British nurseries. Mr. Clouston might have given a reference to the epigram in the Anthology, where the blockhead puts out the candle that the fleas may not see to bite him. It is hard to have to hunt all through the Anthology for the origin of the tale of the Irishmen, the mosquitoes, and the fire-flies which came "looking for us wid' a lantern." Norfolk supplied England with Gothamism as early as the twelfth century, as may be read in a Latin poem, Descriptio Norfolciensium, by a monk of Peterborough. The oldest collection of actual Gotham jokes is thought by Mr. Halliwell Phillips to have been printed between 1556 and 1566, but the oldest extant copy is no later than 1630. There are Gothamites in Tamil, in Icelandic, in Gaelic, in Sanskrit, in Chinese, as well as in Germany, where the Schildburgers burned their village down, in the vain attempt to kill a cat, an adventure which had already occurred in Cashmere. The Arabs have similar stories of the extreme lack of imagination, the heroic literalness which is the chief characteristic of the noodle. Taylor, the Water Poet, has a Gothamism, about a country fellow who, wishing to throw a stone at a town dog, found the stone rammed or paved into the ground, and that tale occurs in the poems of Sadi (A.D. 1278). In Persian the stone was frozen to the ground. But whether the very feeble joke of the land where "they let loose the dogs and fasten the stones" is originally Persian or not, and how it made its way into England, who can discover? The Turks have a form of the dream of the Irishman, who, in a vision, was offered punch by the Pope, and who, preferring it hot, wakened before the liquor was brought, and regretted that he had not taken it cold. The Chinese story is still more like our version than the Turkish, the Chinese being great drinkers of negus. The Scotch "Barring of the Door" is found by Mr. Clouston, not only in Straparola's "Facetious Nights," but in "an Arabian tale," to which he gives no more precise reference, which is a pity. A party of noodles—not man and wife—are the heroes in Turkish. It is a moral tale; the noodles were eaters of bang or haschisch. Similar anecdotes are found in Cashmere, Ceylon, and Sicily. The kind of fool who, being told to make a certain remark on a certain occasion, uses it on all occasions, with disagreeable consequences, is found in Japan and among the Arabs, as well as in M. Charles Deulin's tales of French Flanders. A collection of tales turning on a pun as "Myself did it" or "Nobody did it" illustrates in a pleasant way the story of the Cyclops in the Odyssey, but has not much connexion with noodledom. Better, in this place, are the legends of laments over imaginary misfortunes to an unborn child, found in Sicily, Norway, India, and so forth. Mr. Clouston does not offer any theory of the origin and diffusion of noodle stories. From the examples of Tangarva the Fool and some Zulu cases they appear to exist in very remote and imperfectly civilized races. The Zulu noodle is usually a giant or cannibal; and indeed the giants of European tradition, and even the Devil, often behave like noodles when they are beguiled by the hero. The naturalness of most of the ideas in these märchen might suggest that they spring up spontaneously everywhere; but the close resemblance of minute details in many of Mr. Clouston's stories looks as if noodle stories had often been diffused from a single centre by word of mouth or in literature. The problem is but part of the general question of the diffusion of popular tales. Mr. Clouston's is a handy and amusing little volume, in which we only regret an occasional want of precision in references. On the whole, judging from a brief preface, Mr. Clouston is in favour of something like Benfey's general theory of an Indian origin and diffusion through national migrations and in course of commerce. More will be known about this when more noodle stories from savage races and from ancient Egypt have been discovered and published.

MARK TWAIN'S LIBRARY OF HUMOUR.*

THE reason for calling it Mark Twain's is sufficient, no doubt, though not immediately obvious, and this Library of Humour is readable when approached in the proper way, which is the way of dipping and skipping. Some people are so obtuse to the American joke that they find Josh Billings more than a little silly and much more than a little dull. Well, they can skip him. Then Seba Smith, author of Jack Downing's Letters, "which had immense vogue in their day," does not move to laughter much in this. Wherever he is met in the Library the resource is to get out of his road. A good many persons whose works had vogue "at the South" or elsewhere in their day are to be found represented in this volume. They are curious certainly now and again as showing how honestly many good Americans have laboured to be funny. Horseplay was a resource to them, and at times an old-world trick or two, which was as good as new in America apparently. Mr. Jack Downing, for one, was immensely proud of "ringing the changes," and nobody seems to have heard of that venerable fraud in Portland. This primitive kind of fun is, however, mixed with somewhat fresher matter. Of Mark Twain there is naturally a great deal, and he is an author who shows very well in extracts. In a page or two the reader has not time to become tired of his somewhat mechanical humour. The production of fun by cold and laborious exaggeration—which is often Mark Twain's too obvious trick—becomes very laborious to the reader at times. Where there is real fun in the idea, however, and you have a little at a time, the stuff is tolerable. The volume contains many old friends who need no introduction—"Truthful James" and "Uncle Remus" among them. Moreover, there are examples of the real fun of Mr. Lowell and the attenuated humour of Mr. Howells. Some of the specimens are so new that they have appeared in American magazines within the last year or so. New or old, good or poor, there is always this to be said for them—that they have a quality which is not English. Now it is always useful to look at something different from oneself, and not the less so when it can be got at through one's own language.

PRINCE EUGENE OF SAVOY.†

MOST educated people would be loth to admit that they did not know who Prince Eugene was; but, if they were set down with pen, ink, and paper before them, and ordered to write what they knew about him, their knowledge, we imagine, would be found to consist chiefly of a vague notion that he was an "Imperialist" general, that he somehow played second fiddle to Marlborough at Blenheim, and that "Old Caspar" calls him "Our good Prince Eugene." Some would bethink them that German students are wont to sing a song beginning with the words "Prinz Eugen, der edle Ritter"; but few indeed would be able to go beyond that first line; while readers of Carlyle might remember how much amusement the historian seems to derive from his habit of signing his name in three languages, "Eugenio von Savoye," and would quote the words put into old Friedrich Wilhelm's mouth when he reminds Eugene that the last time they met was on the morning of Malplaquet:—"'Slightly greyer your Highness has grown; I, too, am nothing like so nimble; the Duke, poor man, is dead.' Prince Eugenio von Savoye, we doubt not, took snuff, and answered in a sprightly appropriate manner."

Eugene Francis, the subject of Colonel Malleson's memoir, was born on the 18th of October, 1663. He was a younger son of a cadet branch of the House of Savoy, who had become by marriage Counts of Soissons, and consequently naturalized Frenchmen. Eugene's mother was Olympia Mancini, the most celebrated, if not the most beautiful, of Cardinal Mazarin's famous nieces. She was at first in high favour with Louis XIV., but was supplanted by Mmes. de la Vallière, de Montespan, and others, and was supposed to be implicated in the well-known affair of La Voisin. The refusal of her daughter-in-law to listen to Louis's declaration of passion brought about the final ruin of the family of Soissons; several of Eugene's brothers took service abroad, and he, the youngest, was informed by order of the King that he must prepare to take Holy Orders. This decided him; "the little Abbé," as he was called, fled to the Court of Vienna, where his brother Louis had already been graciously received, and was at once given a command in the Imperial army, then at death-grips with the Turks at the very gates of Vienna. From this time forth Eugene's life counted almost as many campaigns as years. His brother fell in his first battle, and Eugene's personal daring caused him seldom to escape without a wound; nevertheless, he fought against the Turks until the year 1689, during which time Buda and Belgrade were recovered, and the Hungarian insurrection put down. In July of the year 1689 he was on the Rhine, and, as usual, received a wound; in 1690 he met Catinat in Italy for the first time. Betrayed by his cousin, the reigning Duke of Savoy, the Imperial troops were at last forced to evacuate Italy, and soon afterwards Western Europe obtained a momentary respite by the Peace of Ryswick. In the very year, 1697, in which it was signed, Eugene was entrusted with the supreme command of the Army of the Empire, now threatened by Sultan Mustapha II. Eugene overthrew him with immense loss at Zenta on the Danube, and enabled the Emperor to conclude the Peace of Carlowitz, by which the Porte lost half its European dominions.

The war of the Spanish Succession found Eugene again in Italy, with Catinat for his opponent. By a daring flank march he outmanœuvred Catinat, beat him at Carpi, beat his successor Villeroi, and took him prisoner at Cremona, although failing in his audacious attempt to surprise that town, and with a vastly inferior force held his own in Northern Italy against the brilliant strategy of the Duke of Vendôme. The following year found Eugene at Blenheim, and Colonel Malleson does not hesitate (he does not say on what grounds) to claim for him the conception of Marlborough's famous march thither, as well as the chief credit of the victory. On his return from this successful campaign he was straightway despatched to Italy, where he beat Vendôme at Cassano, and then, always with an inferior force, made a wonderful march through the midst of his foes right across the north of Italy, fell upon the French lines before Turin, and by his victory there put an end to the hopes of the Bourbons in Italy. After an unsuccessful attempt on Toulon, in conjunction with Sir Cloudesley Shovel and the English fleet, he accompanied Marlborough to Oudenarde, Lille, and Malplaquet, and continued to fight the French long after we and the Dutch had arranged the Peace of Utrecht. Nor did even the Peace of Baden, between the Emperor and Louis XIV., bring him his well-earned rest. In 1716 he was sent with an army against the Turks, over whom he won a signal victory at Peterwaradein, retook Belgrade after a fierce battle with the relieving force, and enabled his master to conclude a peace by which the Turks were "finally shut out of Hungary, the Banat, Belgrade, part of Bosnia, Servia, and Wallachia."

The next sixteen years were years of peace, but Eugene very narrowly escaped ruin through the plots of jealous rivals. The chief of his enemies, his treacherous cousin the Duke of Savoy, was beyond his reach, but he had the satisfaction of seeing one of the most active of the conspirators against him condemned to be "placed for two hours in the pillory, in the open market-place, to receive thirty stripes on his bare back from a rod wielded by the public executioner, and then be banished the Imperial States." It is pleasant to think of him, full of years and honours, in the palace which he had built upon the ground occupied by the Turks at the siege of Vienna (now the Belvedere Museum), collecting books and MSS. for what became one of the finest private libraries in Europe, and animals for his curious menagerie in the gardens. His last campaigns, in 1733-4, are chiefly memorable to us from his having had the Crown Prince of Prussia serving under him as a pupil, and the audacious criticisms which the future Frederick the Great permitted himself to make upon the old warrior's cautious strategy. Probably Carlyle's explanation of his apparent want of enterprise is the real one:—"Prince Eugene, with an army little to his mind (Reichs Contingents not to be depended upon, thought Eugene), durst not venture; 'Seventeen victorious battles, and if we should be defeated in the eighteenth and last?'"

Colonel Malleson's book is plainly and rather drily written, and has, for an essentially military biography, a defect which almost destroys its value. The maps which it contains are the merest mockery of maps, and, instead of assisting, merely bewilder the reader. For example, in 1701 Eugene was at Roveredo, and we are told that "while he might enter Italy by any of the four roads leading to Bergamo, Brescia, Verona, or Vicenza, it was essential to deceive Catinat as to the one which he selected. . . . He chose the road to Vicenza." We look at the map, and find Bergamo, Brescia, and Verona, but no Vicenza! Again, how can the most eloquent description explain the great battle of Blenheim without a plan or sketch of any sort? Esmond himself, who had been present at that action, could not, as we know, explain it to his friend Mr. Addison without some such assistance. "Hac ibat Simois, here ran the little river Nebel; hic est Sigeia tellus, here are Tallard's headquarters, at the bowl of this pipe, at the attack of which Captain Esmond was present." Nor can any reader understand Eugene's great march to Turin, for the all-important Stradella Pass is not marked in the map. Moreover, most people possess atlases of some sort, which contain maps at least as good as these; but what they have not, and what they need for the comprehension of Eugene's battles, is a series of sketches of the ground on which they were fought, drawn on a large scale. The book abounds with misprints and misspellings; it is handsomely bound in the Imperial black and yellow; but, at the risk of appearing hypercritical, we must protest against the introduction of the arms of Lorraine into the Hapsburg escutcheon, for assuredly they were not there during Eugene's lifetime.

THE STORY OF THE CITY OF NEW YORK.*

THERE has doubtless been a good deal of history transacted in the city of New York between the perhaps a little doubtful, but by no means improbable, discovery of the bay by Verrazano and the erection of Bartholdi's statue. It is like the history of the rest of the United States—a little too prosperous to be very good for literary purposes. Neither are the men who figure in it among the most picturesque or interesting of the human race. With an occasional flutter here and there, mostly in the earlier times, New York has gone on flourishing in very favourable circumstances, till at last it has attained to a most respectable degree of bigness. Mr. C. B. Todd has found its history inspiring enough to fill a volume of 464 pages, very copiously and nicely illustrated. Of Mr. Todd's style we have nothing worse to say than that we would there were less in it of the historic present and less effort to be brilliantly descriptive. When he wishes, for instance, to tell what the state of the colony was at the end of the Dutch period, he breaks out in this fashion:—

> Perhaps we can best depict the people's daily life by inviting the reader to join us in a stroll through the city—the time a clear, cool, September day in 1663. Shall we enter by this arched gateway at Broadway and Wall Street, or by the "Water Gate" at the point where Wall Street now meets the East River front? The latter.

Through the Water Gate Mr. Todd introduces the personally conducted reader to "a bevy of maidens with bare, dimpled arms," a pleasing spectacle; to "worthy Martin Cregier, President of the Burgomasters and Captain of the Burgher Guard"; and to many other things in what may be called the Cook's conductor style. There be who like it, and for them it is supplied, no doubt. In this or in other fashions Mr. Todd tells the history of the city—with no more patriotic feeling than is natural and proper. Of course a good American must necessarily hold, more or less openly, that English officers and soldiers were very sinister scoundrels, and Mr. Todd has a quiet leaning that way. On the whole, however, he speaks of the old times without obtrusive partisanship. The greater part of the volume is naturally devoted to colonial days and the War of Independence. Business prosperity is good to enjoy, but not enticing to write about; and there has not been much else in the later history of New York. Of what else there is—the Draft Riots and the Tammany Ring, for instance—Mr. Todd speaks at no undue length; and he does not attribute either of them to the wicked Europeans who trouble the peace of virtuous America. Finally, there is a chapter on "The Triumphs of Art," which turn out to be Brooklyn Bridge and Bartholdi's statue of Liberty—big things, both of them. Mr. Todd dismisses them in the style of a newspaper report, and so ends his book a little abruptly.

IRISH PAMPHLETS.*

In the compass of some eighty-six pages Mr. Canning has told the history of Ireland from Tudor days to the present time. It would be unreasonable to expect that his little book should add much to what is already known on the subject of which it treats. Indeed, all the author claims to do is to impartially examine familiar facts. His object is to set out fairly and without prejudice the causes of Irish discontent, and in many respects the attempt is successful. Mr. Canning writes with moderation, and though it is clear that he is in politics a Unionist, he keeps his opinions well under control. It is, perhaps, inevitable that impartial histories should be dull. Had Macaulay been less of a partisan his writings would be far less attractive, and the Divided Irish certainly suffers in interest from its studied fairness. On the other hand, Mr. Canning's book has many qualities. It is short, the style is clear and unaffected, and, if there are occasionally rather purposeless digressions, they are always brief. We could have wished that these same digressions had been replaced by rather more historical detail. On the whole, however, we have little fault to find save that we think that in his diagnosis of the diseases of Ireland Mr. Canning makes rather too much of the religious and too little of the economical troubles.

We have also another of those useful little pamphlets issued by the Irish Loyal and Patriotic Union. The present one gives an account of the operation of the Plan of Campaign on the Ponsonby, Kingston, Lansdowne, O'Grady, and Brooke estates. The object is to show how, quite apart from all theoretical dangers, in practice, a system which makes one of two parties to a quarrel the judge in his own cause does not work well. No doubt in Ireland, as elsewhere, some landlords have treated their tenants badly; but that is a poor consolation to those good landlords who, to suit the convenience of agitators, have been selected for spoliation. It is much like the old story of the barrister who was asked what he thought as to the justice of the law. "No doubt," said he, "some guilty men are acquitted, but, then, other innocent ones are convicted, so that, on the whole, justice is done."

An unobjectionable little pamphlet is that on Irish Grievances. They seem to be only four or five in number, and remediable with very little legislative exertion. Would that it were so! and that the Irish problem were not more than five times as difficult and complicated as Mr. Thomson Hankey appears to believe! According to his optimistic estimate, if we would but abolish the Lord-Lieutenancy and diminish the number of railway Companies in Ireland, little else would be needed to restore peace and prosperity to the Emerald Isle. Alas! the day for such gentle methods is over. Time was when much might have been done by these and similar reforms. An admirable opportunity for such a policy occurred in 1869. A less favourable chance was given us in 1881. But the Minister in power preferred to gratify his vanity by heroic legislation, and now it is too late. The English people must recognize that for the present "resolute government," and nothing else, can cure Irish disorder.

THE ORDERS OF CHIVALRY.*

On one of the oldest monuments in the world, that of a lady named Atet, who must have lived and died before the great pyramid was built, we are told that her husband, Nefermat, had received a decoration, a gold collar, apparently, from his grateful sovereign. We cannot go further back. Yet here, at a period which, pace Archbishop Ussher, cannot be placed much later than 4000 B.C., we find human nature, in that respect at least, much what it is now. Nefermat, K.G. or G.C., or whatever answered in those days to the sign of a modern "Order of Chivalry," was the earliest example we know of a decorated person. The hunger and thirst for decorations seems to have lasted unsatisfied ever since—namely, for some six thousand years; and it would be perfectly safe to prophesy that it will survive almost every institution on earth. Principalities and powers, empires and dynasties, all may disappear, but decorations will endure to the end. The recent scandals in France show how indispensable they are to the mind of the "Latin races." The Americans of the United States say they can do without them—but instead they must have their "Colonels" and "Honorables" and "Judges"—and the longing for titles is just as strong with them as it is with the French. Major Lawrence-Archer has nothing very new—except new orders—to offer us in the handsome quarto before us. He speaks of orders "of chivalry"; but there are very few now extant which date from the middle ages, and in those few chivalry, or anything like it, plays a very minor part. A straight vote in Parliament, a seat won from the Opposition, a successful mayoralty, a congratulatory address—these be the doughty deeds of the knights of our days, always excepting the decorations won on the battle-field by the officers and men of the regular army. Major Lawrence-Archer omits baronets; and it may be a question whether they are still to be reckoned as knights. Before the reign of George IV. they certainly could and constantly did claim knighthood.

The English Order of the Garter, or St. George, is the oldest of European "orders of chivalry," dating as it does almost certainly from the year 1348, or possibly a few years earlier. The Order of the Bath might be considered nearly as old, as we first hear of it in 1399, but it became obsolete and extinct from the time of the Great Rebellion, and was only revived by George I. in 1725. A great many new orders have been instituted in the present reign. Besides the Victoria Cross and the Albert Medal, and the Family Order, we have the Star of India, the enlargement of the Colonial Order of St. Michael and St. George, the Order of the Indian Empire, and the so far anonymous "distinguished service order." But foreign kings and states have multiplied their orders even more; and even the little Republic of San Marino has its Grand Officers, Commanders, Officers, and Chevaliers, who wear the effigy of St. Martin, according to Major Lawrence-Archer, and appropriate badges and stars. Even Hawaii has its orders, "the insignia of which draw attention to the rapid stride of that island kingdom in the march of civilization," says Major Lawrence-Archer. He places next in rank and antiquity to the Garter the Golden Fleece founded in 1429, and now divided into the Austrian and Spanish branches. Most previous authorities have assigned precedence next to the Garter to the Elephant of Denmark; but Major Lawrence-Archer does not mention it in his preface, which places next to the Garter the Golden Fleece, and in the third place the Italian Annunziata—"the Order of the Snares of Love," or the Collar, from its love-knots. But the Elephant was in existence in the time of Christian I. of Denmark, who began to reign in 1448, and it was even then accounted ancient. Danish authorities assert that King Christian restored it as "the Society and Fraternity of the Holy Virgin Mary." The famous Tower and Sword of Portugal is modern, though there is, or was, an old Portuguese Order of the Sword. The Swedish Seraphim claims great antiquity, but was revived in 1748. The most singular of all orders belongs to the same kingdom—that of Charles XIII., which "was founded by the monarch after whom it is named on the 17th May, 1811, for Freemasons of the higher degrees." In this respect it differs from all others. The Prince of Wales is a Knight of Charles XIII.

In the East the mania for orders has spread of late years with great rapidity. The Turks and Egyptians have numerous badges, some of which are well known among English officers, who, strange to say, covet and relish such honours very warmly. Japan has its Eastern Sun, for civil and military merit, and its Chrysanthemum, instituted in 1876, and so far only conferred on crowned heads and princes of the blood, with two exceptions; Prince Sanjo Sanetomi and Prince Bismarck being the only knights of the Chrysanthemum of lower rank. In China, in 1862, the exceptional services of General Gordon suggested the foundation of an order for foreigners. It was at first called "Paou Sing," or the Precious Star, but has bloomed out into "the Imperial Order of the Double Dragon." After this it is hardly worth while to mention "the Liberian Humane Order of African Redemption," or the Malagasy "Silver Medal of Merit," instituted by King Radama II. before his assassination.

GERMAN SOCIALISM.*

SOCIALISM will probably not be found to be the answer to any problem, economic or political. It is, however, in its origin and character a historic problem, and as such deserving of careful study. Professing to be humanitarian and cosmopolitan—or, to use its own dialect, international—it is as varied as the countries and civilizations in which it has sprung up. It is essentially a creature of particular institutions, of natural conditions, of political and religious and ethnological traditions. French Socialism is one thing; English Socialism is another; German Socialism a third. The volume before us narrates the history and expounds the doctrines of German Socialism in a very clear and interesting fashion, connecting them with the individual influences which have been most powerful in the work of propagandism, with the philosophic ideas which have fostered them, and with the social and constitutional changes which have contributed to their development. Mr. Dawson writes not as a controversialist, but as an expositor, a historian, and a biographer. He has drawn from original sources; he is well acquainted, not only with the writings of the German Socialists, but with the contemporary history, literature, and philosophy of Germany; and so is enabled, while isolating his special topic for separate examination, yet at the same time to exhibit its connexion with the general influences which have acted upon it, and on which it has reacted. Mr. Dawson's book exhibits the results of thorough and conscientious study. His knowledge, though full, is assimilated and digested, and falls into its natural place in the course of his exposition and narrative. It is a staff which sustains him, and not a burden which presses him down.

The growth of Socialism in Germany during the past twenty years, and, more than its growth, its political organization, are remarkable. Of the significance of them no one probably is more sensible than the German Chancellor. In the election of 1887 to the German Reichstag, as Mr. Dawson points out, nearly eight hundred thousand votes were given for Socialist candidates—that is, one in ten, or thereabouts, of the whole voting population was Socialist. In 1871 the number of Socialist voters was 120,000, and the number of Socialists returned to the German Parliament was only two. Mr. Dawson contends that Socialist principles are more widely diffused than the Socialist party. "The State post, telegraph, railway, and bank, the free-school, the Poor-law system, the factory laws, sanitary legislation," all these things, he contends, are applications of Socialist doctrine. In saying this he speaks rather as a rhetorician or moralist than as a philosopher or economist. The action of the State for the advantage of the whole community, as in the case of the General Post Office, or for the relief and protection of particular classes, as in our factory legislation and Poor-laws, or in Prince Bismarck's Accident and Sickness Insurance Laws, and his Old Age and Indigence Insurance projects, may be called Socialistic in the sense in which a humane and philanthropic feeling and a sense of the social obligations of the State to its poorer subjects, as opposed to a narrow egotism and individualism, may be called Socialistic. But this has nothing to do with economic Socialism, the essence of which is the transfer of land and capital, the material and the instruments of production, from individual owners to the State. On the contrary, our Poor-law and Prince Bismarck's Insurance laws proceed on the assumption that land and capital are held in private hands, and that the accumulation and distribution of wealth are regulated by freedom of competition. They have for their object to alleviate some of the incidental hardships of this system, the existence of which they assume. They are the medicine of disease, and not the bread of life.

The two principal figures in the history of German Socialism during the present century are those of Karl Marx, its historian and economist, and Ferdinand Lassalle, its agitator, demagogue, and, as his followers call him, its Messiah—a Messiah of an inverse and demoniac, not to say diabolic, character. Karl Marx's chief contribution to the economical theory of Socialism is his doctrine of surplus value. Whether it originated with him, or whether he borrowed it from Rodbertus, is a controversy into which we need not enter. It has its counterpart in the history of every new doctrine, and of every doctrine claiming novelty. The principle may be briefly stated in order as briefly to expose the fallacy on which it rests. Labour, Marx contends, is the source of value; the labourer for wages receives only as much of that value as suffices for his subsistence and that of his family; what is over and above this—the surplus value, as Marx calls it—though really produced by the labourer, is intercepted by the capitalist, who gets it without paying for it, or, in other words, steals it. It is employed in further production, in glutting the market, by which prices are lowered and wages with them. The result is products in excess of the power of purchase, and a population of labourers for wages, which, rapidly multiplying, reduces by competition in its own ranks its earnings to the mere point of subsistence. The remedy is in the appropriation by the State of land and capital, and the organization of labour. The answer to all this is that, in speaking of labour as the source of production, Marx recognizes only the labour of the hands. He leaves out of account the labour of the head, invention, improvement of processes, the discovery of markets, the work of management and direction. The surplus value is the payment for this mental labour, and is fairly earned by it. As a matter of fact, in the majority of trades, the wages of labour are far above the level of subsistence, as is shown by Savings Bank returns, the shortened hours of work, and the greater expenditure of the working classes on articles of luxury and the pursuit of amusements, harmless and healthy or the reverse. Excessive or ill-directed production of material articles and multiplication of population are evils, the remedy of which must be left to intelligence and foresight.

The most popularly interesting chapters of Mr. Dawson's book are devoted to the career of Ferdinand Lassalle, to whose genius and force of character and to the extraordinary fascination he exercised over men and women alike, Heinrich Heine and Bismarck, Von Humboldt and Boeckh, have borne ungrudging testimony. The story of his death, and the infatuated passion which brought it about, has been told by Mr. George Meredith, in his Tragic Comedians, in, perhaps, too exclusive dependence on the truthfulness of the fair sinner whose confessions Mr. Meredith almost verbally transcribes. Lassalle united the profligacy and the power of work with the genius and the charm which gave Bolingbroke his ascendency over his contemporaries. His career, from his intrigue with the Countess von Hatzfeld and the celebrated theft of the casket, to the duel in which he met his death, seems to belong to another age than the nineteenth century. Under more favourable circumstances of race and time, there might have been in Lassalle the making, if not of a Bolingbroke, yet of an Alberoni or a Ripperda.

FRENCH LITERATURE.

M. GASTON PARIS'S long-promised short treatise on old French literature (1) has appeared and may be welcomed almost simpliciter, in the first place as the work of the best qualified man now living, and in the second as thoroughly worthy, within its scale and scope, of its author's reputation. We need only add in a necessarily short notice two particular criticisms, one on each side. The bibliographical notes are beyond praise, as giving exactly the sources of amplification necessary to a short précis like this, and combining information which might be sought wearily and yet missed elsewhere. But we could just wish that M. Paris had been occasionally less dogmatic on points where, though no living opinion is more authoritative than his, dogmatic certainty is impossible. This positiveness is, perhaps, a less evil than mere vagueness; but it is not wholly a good.

It has always been recognized that mercantile language is in every country a language by itself, and perhaps this is even more the case in French than in English, because trade has never in France had so intimate a connexion with literature and with the general life of the nation as in England. At the same time, even the conservative formulas of trade vary a little from time to time, or at any rate require fresh adjustment to ordinary speech. Dr. Vogel's Manual, in two parts, French-English and English-French (2), is, we think, the fullest and most careful we have ever seen. Besides a varied letter-writer, it includes pattern forms of all sorts of commercial documents—such as invoices, waybills, dock-warrants, and what not—as well as two very complete commercial vocabularies.

Non-naval readers may have recently heard, from the name of a certain war-ship, of Admiral Baudin (3), and aloud or sotto voce have wondered who he was. It has given even the fluent pen of Admiral Jurien de la Gravière some trouble to spin the answer into a short volume. Baudin was, no doubt, a gallant and skilful officer; and we dare say that, if he had had more opportunities than the half-privateering "guerre de partisans," which was alone open to the French navy after Trafalgar, he would have taken them. But as it is, it is a case of "if the bridge had been stronger." We may add that we are a little surprised at a sailor and a gentleman like the Admiral apologizing for the "vivacity" of such a ruffian as Lieut. Moreau, who, by Baudin's own account, stabbed an English captain (James says a midshipman as well) after surrender, and then hustled him on board his own ship with such "brutality" that Baudin himself had to rescue him from being either drowned or crushed between the two vessels. It is a comfort to remember that "mon pauvre ami Moreau," as Baudin calls this commissioned pirate, afterwards threw himself overboard to escape the yardarm he so richly deserved when his ship was captured by the San Fiorenzo.

The collection in two stout volumes of miscellaneous and previously uncollected essays of the late M. Caro (4) exhibits the well-known features of his work—a sufficiently graceful but not very distinguished style, judicious if not very original thought, and a competent academical kind of general handling.

Something not wholly dissimilar, but less complimentary, may be said of the new instalment of M. Deschanel's Collège de France lectures (5), which are inferior in elegance both of style and judgment, but good in their way. The handling of Perrault is rather slight; as for Boileau, M. Deschanel has evidently remembered the caution that "ça porte malheur" to speak ill of Nicolas the ill-tempered. But the "reserves" of his favourable judgment amount to a pretty formidable indictment.

The two authors just noticed write sensible literary criticism in a sensible way. M. Larocque (6), after disclaiming such a task altogether in a preface which, we suppose, is meant to be spirituel, then goes and does it in a roundabout and indirect fashion; but, on the whole, with much the same result as other people's, only worse.

M. de Varigny's book (7) on Oceania is apparently based on personal experience as well as reading, but it would be improved if the results of the two were more clearly discriminated. Still, it is readable and sometimes instructive, despite its desultory composition and arrangement.

We have received the third volume of M. Bengesco's charming Œuvres choisies de Voltaire (Paris: Librairie des Bibliophiles) containing Candide, the immortal, and L'ingénu; a very ambitious work on L'évolution des mondes et des sociétés (Paris: Alcan) by M. F. C. Dreyfus, deputy and deductive reasoner, wherein the reason of all things, past, present, and to come, is rattled off with a lively sciolism than which we can conceive nothing more repulsive to Mr. Darwin himself, and nothing more alien from his methods; and a Morale de Socrate (Paris: Alcan) by Mme. Jules Favre, in which translated extracts from Plato and Xenophon are grouped together under heads with short introductions to each batch.

NEW BOOKS AND REPRINTS.

An agreeable diversion from the common round of galleries and churches prescribed to the tourist in Italy is suggested by Mr. Samuel Butler's Ex Voto: an Account of the Sacro Monte at Varallo-Sesia (Trübner & Co.) Thanks to the railway, the visitor to Milan may now, by way of Novara, easily gain the once almost inaccessible new Jerusalem of Varallo-Sesia, which Bernardino Caimi, the pious founder, lived only to view with the eye of faith; and, thanks to Mr. Butler, he may return from inspecting the frescoes and sculptures of Gaudenzio Ferrari and Tabachetti a sadder and a wiser man. If his artistic creed be in any way orthodox, we can promise him not a few novel sensations or shocks from reading Ex Voto. Mr. Butler must needs be atilting at what he conceives to be some current cant, born of tyrannical custom or blind opinion—Darwinism it may be, or it may be Raphaelism. He is equally entertaining in his characteristic vigour of style when exalting Tabachetti over Michael Angelo or insisting on the ineffable superiority of Gaudenzio compared with Raphael, as when he estimated the indebtedness of Darwin to Lamarck in a former volume. Ex Voto is something more than an admirable traveller's handbook. The graphic and doubtless valuable description of the forty and more chapels of the Sacro Monte will of course assist visitors greatly, as it is the result of careful and minute observation; but the author's ironical humour and extremely original criticism are what constitute the life of the book. The curious phase of sixteenth-century art represented at Varallo may not be of the importance assigned to it by Mr. Butler, yet its neglect by English writers must be admitted in some sort. In Sir Charles Eastlake's edition of Kugler we find no mention of Jean Baptiste Tabaquet, or Tabachetti, though Gaudenzio is referred to as a Luinesque painter of the Milanese school. Even in the "Lexicon" of Nagler there is only a meagre note on the sculptor, who is preferred by Mr. Butler before his associates Gaudenzio and Giovanni d'Enrico, while Sir A. H. Layard is visited with sundry not very gentle gibes on account of the few observations on Gaudenzio and Tabachetti in his edition of Kugler. We do not now propose to consider the art of Varallo from the æsthetic standpoint, though we think Mr. Butler betrays a strange misapprehension of what is meant by realism in art in his chapter on the aim and scope of the Varallo artists. Putting aside the special means employed, the application of paint to terracotta—not to speak of the horsehair and old garments—realism is the expressive quality of Tabachetti, and realism that is closely akin to that of Mr. George Tinworth's terracotta reliefs. Unless the "process" plates from reductions of photographs which illustrate this book misrepresent the originals even more than Mr. Butler admits, realism in facial expression and gesture is carried far beyond its legitimate aim—is, indeed, opposed to the very genius of sculpture. The pictorial power of the compositions is, indeed, clearly revealed in the illustrations. The reader of Mr. Butler's interesting book may settle the question himself, as prints from the negatives may be obtained at the Birkbeck Institution, and compared with the reductions.

Hildebrand and his Times (Longmans & Co.) is the title of the Rev. Prebendary Stephens's contribution to the "Epochs of Church History" series. The book is excellently lucid and well proportioned. The life of the great Pope who loved righteousness and hated iniquity forms naturally the substantial interest of the volume; but the author has, with sound judgment, not treated it as constituting in itself an epoch of ecclesiastical history. The aim of this series is admirably realized by the broader and more inclusive definition of the epoch of Papal and Imperial strife which ended with the Council of Worms in 1322.

Mr. W. Hastie's Hymns and Thoughts on Religion (Edinburgh: T. & T. Clark) is a volume of translations from Novalis, intended for meditative readers rather than criticism. It is prefaced by Just's memoir, and a portrait which reveals, more than some portraits of Novalis, a curious resemblance to Shelley as he is represented, or misrepresented according to Peacock, in Mrs. Shelley's edition of the poet. Mr. Hastie's versified renderings of Novalis strike us as somewhat bald. The spiritual beauty of the prose originals is much more successfully preserved in the reflective passages "Thoughts on Religion." They suffice to show to the English reader that the "philosophy of religion" is no empty phrase, and that the transcendentalism of Novalis was not without concrete form.

Mary Stuart, by the late John Hosack (Blackwood & Sons), is a little volume dealing with the controversial points treated in extenso in the larger work on the subject by the lamented author. From the preface by Mr. James Hosack, we learn that this recapitulation of accusations and answers was not revised by Mr. Hosack, and is unhappily unfinished. It is none the less interesting summary and forcibly written.

and Difficulties. By the Constructor, T. A. WALKER. 1 vol. royal 8vo. with a large number of Plans and Illustrations.

NEW NOVELS AT ALL LIBRARIES.

THE REBEL ROSE. 3 vols. crown 8vo.

"An anonymous novel called 'The Rebel Rose' is certain if it is possible to speculate on such an uncertain element as popular interest— to attract exceptional attention. It is a political romance, which, nevertheless, those who care for romance and not for politics, and those who care for politics and not for romance, will alike read with interest. We have formed our own very decided opinion as to the authorship of this altogether remarkable production; but whether that opinion be right or wrong, it is evidently enough the work of one or more persons who are very much behind the social and political scenes." Graphic.

Now ready.

A MODERN BRIGAND. By the Author of

"Miss Bayle's Romance" &c. 3 vols. crown 8vo.

"Written by a man of culture and a keen observer, 'A Modern Brigand' stands completely apart from the current fiction of the day. Freshness and originality meet the reader from the first page, and stamp each situation and incident until its close."—Morning Post.

Now ready.

THE ACADEMICIAN. By HENRY ERROLL,

Author of "An Ugly Duckling" &c. 3 vols. crown 8vo.

"In this clever romance Mr. Erroll, without violating probability, or being sensationally realistic, has found a subject which he develops with rare artistic ability and dramatic effect. 'The Academician' is an able work, original in conception and forcibly written."—Morning Post.

MESSRS. LONGMANS & CO.'S LIST.

THE ENGLISH IN THE WEST INDIES;

Or, The Bow of Ulysses.

By JAMES A. FROUDE.

With 9 Illustrations from Sketches by the Author.

Crown 8vo. price 2s. boards; 2s. 6d. cloth. [In a few days.

"Mr. Froude's brilliant book on the West Indies is, perhaps, the most enjoyable he has ever written, and has a wider interest than might be inferred from the title. Never has he thrown himself with more intensity into those broad and burning questions which concern the future of the empire. Never has he found happier opportunity for fervent eloquence or picturesque description, and he has seldom displayed his powers to greater advantage. He has ingeniously searched out analogies and contrasts; he has drawn wide political deductions from the facts that have come under his observation; by turns he is persuasive, indignant, or sarcastic, and not infrequently he breaks out in scathing invective. Consequently, the book is full of a double interest, for it reflects on every page the opinions and personality of the writer."—Times.

Now ready, fcp. 8vo. price ONE SHILLING.

PICTURES AT PLAY;

Or, Dialogues of the Galleries.
